PERSONNEL: Grievance procedure ends with final and binding arbitration; university may pay expenses for national regional professional meetings; faculty and staff meetings will be held monthly; evaluations will include an interview with the employee by the Faculty Appointment and Promotion Committee, self-evaluation forms, student evaluation forms from one class each semester (the class to be selected by the person being evaluated), recommendations from appropriate parties, recommendations and other material from the person being evaluated, and recommendations from the dean of the Seminary; a tenured faculty member may within 14 days after receiving notification of dismissal in which charges and specifications are included, send a written reply to the dean and the Appointment and Promotion Committee requesting a hearing; the faculty member may call upon outside counsel in his defense; the hearing committee will reach its decision on the basis of the evidence presented at the hearing within five working days after the close of the hearing unless otherwise agreed upon; if the president fails to sustain a committee decision favorable to the faculty member, the association may within 10 days notify the president in writing of its intention to appeal the matter to the board; the review of the board will be based on the record of the committee hearing accompanied by argument, oral or written, or both, by the principles or their representatives; the board will render the final decision; if it becomes necessary for the board to terminate a continuous appointment because of financial exigency, the amount of notification will depend on the position; a tenured faculty member will receive no less than 12 months' notification before the termination date, a full-time nontenured faculty member no less than nine months, and a full-time professional staff member no less than six months; all part-time staff positions will be eliminated before a nontenured full-time faculty member is terminated; remaining nontenured faculty members will be terminated according to recommendations based on guidelines established by the Faculty Program Development Committee which will include recognition of institutional academic and administration program needs, seniority, and individual circumstances; the final decision will be made by the board.

NONRENEWAL

Prior to the termination of a tenured faculty member's appointment the Institutional Advancement Committee shall meet with the President and Dean for a thorough discussion of the situation. The discussion shall include a specific number of tenured positions to be terminated or other information which will make sufficiently clear to the Committee, the Board's intentions in declaring a financial exigency. The Committee shall be given opportunity to submit a report and a recommendation for the reduction of tenured faculty positions in writing within 30 days to the Board of Directors. Such statement shall be responsive to the financial exigency and shall indicate program priorities. The Board shall make a decision and document the reasons for its decision in a written statement to the Association. In the event the Board's tenured faculty reduction determination differs in program priorities but not in the number of positions to be reduced from the recommendation of the Institutional Advancement Committee, the Board shall return its decision to the Institutional Advancement Committee within ten (10) working days. The Committee shall review the Board's determination within 5 days. If three-fourths (3/4) of the full Committee vote to uphold the Board's determination then it shall stand and be final. If three-fourths (3/4) of the Committee do not vote to uphold then the Committee's own recommendation on the program areas involved in the reduction of tenured faculty positions shall prevail and be final.

Before terminating an appointment because of financial exigency, the administration will make every effort to place the affected full-time faculty member and professional staff in other suitable positions within the institution. If retention is not possible, the administration shall assume responsibility for assisting the faculty or staff member in securing other employment consistent with that person's abilities.

In the event that a tenured appointment is terminated, a replacement for the released faculty member shall not be appointed within two years from the effective date of the release unless the released faculty member has been offered reappointment in writing by mail and has had a period of not less than thirty (30) days in which to accept or decline the offer.

APPOINTMENT

Appointment Procedure:

- Determination of the need for a faculty appointment shall be the responsibility of the Faculty Program Development Committee and the Dean of the Seminary.

- Recommendations for appointment of particular candidates for full-time and part-time faculty and staff positions shall originate with the Appointment and Promotion Committee.

- After each candidate has been interviewed by the members of the faculty and students, the Appointment and Promotion Committee shall submit their recommendations to the Dean.

The Appointment:

- Each appointment shall be approved by the Dean of the Seminary after receipt of the recommendation of the Appointment and Promotion Committee.

- Initial appointments shall be probationary and for a term of one year. Initial faculty appointments do not imply automatic reappointment and shall not grant tenure unless specifically recommended by the President and approved by the Board. Appointees shall receive a copy of this Agreement, and a letter of appointment and acceptance. The letter of appointment and acceptance shall include, Interalia: (a) the dates for which appointment is effective, (b) the salary, (c) the professional rank, and (d) the teaching or administrative assignments.

Qualifications: The minimum basis for appointment or advancement may be stated as follows:

- An Instructor shall normally have the M. Div. degree or its equivalent or substantial progress toward a doctorate.

- An Assistant Professor shall normally have the M. Div. degree and substantial progress toward the doctorate or its equivalent, at least three (3) years of successful teaching in higher education and an acceptable rating on the evaluative criteria given below in Para. 51. A person who holds a Ph.D. degree or its equivalent may also be given the rank of assistant professor regardless of previous teaching experience.

- An Associate Professor shall normally have the Ph.D. degree or its equivalent, and an acceptable rating on the evaluative criteria given below in Para. 51, and at least six (6) years of successful teaching in higher education.

- A Professor shall normally have the Ph.D. degree or its equivalent, at least eight (8) years of successful teaching in higher education and an acceptable rating on the evaluative criteria given below in Para. 51.

Exceptions to the degree-requirements for the various ranks as set forth in this section can be recommended by the Appointment and Promotion Committee in cases of extraordinary records of experience, training, or competence in fields related to theological education.

After three successive one-year probationary contracts, a faculty member who has received a favorable evaluation will be tendered a one-, two-, or three-year contract; the Faculty Appointment and Promotion Committee will meet with each faculty member not less than 45 days prior to the renewal to evaluate that member's performance during the year and to make recommendations to the dean; the report of the Committee in the sixth year of the faculty member's employment will include a recommendation for granting tenure or a recommendation for separation from the institution; should an employee's evaluation reveal any inadequacies, the faculty member will have an opportunity to submit a plan to remedy those inadequacies; after a maximum of seven years, full-time qualified professional faculty members will be granted tenure.

TENURE

Tenure shall be defined as that status wherein a member of the faculty shall be retained until that person reaches the retirement age of 65, unless the member (1) resigns; (2) is dismissed due to the financial exigencies of the Seminary according to the procedure described in Para. 61-65.; or (3) is dismissed for just cause. Just causes for purposes of this Article include (a) physical or mental incapacity; (b) neglect of duty; (c) conviction of a felony during the period of employment; (d) intentional dishonesty; (e) professional incompetence; (f) moral turpitude; (g) intentional and substantial disruption of the functioning of the University. In any dismissal of a member of the faculty on tenure, the University has the burden of proving just cause.

The total period of continuous full-time service at the University of Dubuque prior to the acquisition of continuous tenure will not exceed seven years. Three or more years of previous full-time service with the rank of instructor or higher in other institutions of higher learning will reduce the probationary period to a maximum of four years, even though the total full-time service in the profession may thereby exceed seven years. The terms of such extension will be stated in writing at the time of initial appointment.

Summer teaching assignments are voluntary; volunteers will be employed on a rotation basis deemed equitable by the Faculty Program Development Committee and the dean; when opportunities for advancement occur, the university will promote from within and on the basis of ability rather than length of service; the Appointment Committee will review the qualifications of any faculty member applying for promotion and make its recommendations to the president; if there are any conflicting view points or unresolved judgments in the Committee, the conflicting arguments will be submitted in separate written reports to the president; the president will then submit his own recommendations along with the written reports to the board of directors for final action.

SPECIAL REPORTS

COST-OF-LIVING PROVISIONS IN TEACHER/BOARD AGREEMENTS

Owing to record rates of inflation over the past year, salary negotiations have centered on clauses aimed at maintaining purchasing power. Since annual rates of key indicators, such as the Consumer Price Index (CPI) and the Wholesale Price Index, have exceeded double digit percentage increases, equivalent raises in teacher salaries are being sought. To negate the effects of spiralling inflation, various wage adjustment mechanisms are being used. The cost-of-living (COL) clause is one mechanism which can provide a measure of protection against inflation.

To effectively negotiate a COL clause an array of the elements should be considered in constructing it. Excerpts from typical provisions are presented in this article to illustrate the operation of such elements and should not be regarded as ideal. Additional provisions, including available state models, are also presented. No attempt is made to introduce a model COL clause. Data on the incidence and types of COL provisions are insufficient for statistical analysis and trend projection. However, some conclusions are drawn from private sector practice and examination of provisions in contracts primarily from Michigan, New York, and Pennsylvania.

Three methods in general use provide for salary increases in relation to the rate of price increases as measured by the CPI: the reopener clause, the escalator during a contract year, and the cost-of-living adjustment at the end of a contract year of a multi-year contract. They may be used separately or in combination. The reopener clause provides for new salary negotiations when the CPI reaches or passes a predetermined mark, or at the end of a contract year in multiyear contracts. Escalator clauses and COL clauses employ a formula for automatically adjusting individual salaries or generating a new wage table on the basis of an increase in the CPI. The escalator clause adjusts wages during the contract year rather than once a year, and, therefore, is of greater advantage to the wage earner.

Whether the choice be the during-the-year escalator, or the end-of-year adjustment, or some combination of the two, clarity in COL clause language should be of primary concern to the negotiating parties. Special care should be taken to define terms accurately and to fully describe the intended operation of the clause. An important consideration is to ensure that the COL adjustment is clearly understood by all parties to be separate from in-step increases or wage improvement increases. Also, a COL increase should be applied after the wage improvement increase is applied. School boards might lump COL increases with the yearly salary improvement and may refer to the total as a teacher's "raise". This fails to recognize that the COL increase merely helps teacher salaries keep pace with inflation between negotiated raises.

The complexity of a COL provision can be gauged from the number of variables the negotiator must define and interrelate. [A taxonomy of the variables identified to date is appended.] The major items include Index selection; the time period to be measured for change; the base date from which change is to be measured; the formula for calculating change; the period for salary adjustment; the effective date of the adjustment, the application of the adjustment, with minimum and/or maximum limits; the additional improvement, if any; and the effect on the salary schedule, including the method of translating the COL increase into dollar amounts.

With better than 20-years' experience in negotiating COL provisions in the private sector, the typical COL escalator clause in a multiyear contract carefully defines the index to be used, provides for quarterly escalation, gives a table of salary adjustment dates, utilizes a formula that converts a point increase in the CPI to a cents increase in hourly wages, stipulates a guaranteed minimum or an annual improvement in wage scales, and may be limited to a maximum or ceiling COL increase, but guarantees that wages will not decrease should a decrease occur in the CPI.

Association negotiators can benefit from the experience of negotiators for private sector contracts and the general acceptance of COL clauses, but they are faced with the reality that most teacher contracts are single-year agreements and only a few are as comprehensive as industrial union contracts. Given the existence of a comprehensive contract, a school board, as does private industry, may opt for the relative security from the stresses of yearly contract negotiations and/or labor peace through a multiyear agreement. If an association relinquishes the opportunity for annual contract revision and salary improvement through negotiation, it must secure some measure of protection from the eroding force of inflation in the second and subsequent years of a contract.

Most COL provisions in teacher contracts provide for an adjustment in the second or subsequent years of a contract. About a third of the clauses reported also call for a general salary increase in conjunction with the COL adjustment. Few, however, have a guaranteed minimum COL increase regardless of the change in the CPI. The escalating factor usually employed is the percent change in the CPI (as opposed to the point difference) over 12 months or a calendar year. A few unacceptable clauses have been noted, for example, agreement to lower salaries if the CPI decreases and agreement on a reduction in force if necessary to pay the COL adjustment. The guide to COL variables presented below should aid those contemplating such provisions to cover requisite areas and avoid problems of interpretation when the clause goes into effect.

Table 1 lists the monthly CPI figures, calendar year averages, and percent change from year to year. The percent change from the previous year by the month is also listed from January 1970 to the present. The Table can be completed as the last quarter CPI marks become available by using the footnoted formula for percent changes.

INDEX SELECTION

SELECTION OF A SUITABLE INDEX INVOLVES THE OPTIONS BELOW:

1. Index Base

Two index bases, 1957-59=100 and the newer 1967=100, are currently published. Work on a new index base for the 1970's is about half completed; publication of that index by the Bureau of Labor Statistics is scheduled for 1976. While the 1967=100 index will likely be published concurrently with the new index, the change in bases should be anticipated. Sample language regarding protections in case of unavailability of the CPI in present form, appears below.

> In the event the Bureau of Labor Statistics ceases monthly publication of the Index in its present form the adjustment shall be calculated from conversion figures thereafter compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.
> If the Consumer Price Index in its present form and calculated on the same basis shall be revised therefrom or discontinued, the parties shall attempt to determine an appropriate Consumer Price Index figure by agreement or, if agreement is not reached, the parties shall request the Bureau of Labor Statistics to make available a Consumer Price Index in its present form for the appropriate date or dates and calculated on a comparable basis. Any scheduled salary increases delayed by contingencies discussed in this paragraph shall be paid as of the first regular pay day subsequent to receipt of the delayed Consumer Price Index information and shall be retroactive to the appropriate calculation date.
> Any change in Schedule A-3 shall apply only to the fiscal year beginning with July 1, 1972.
> If the publication of the index shall be discontinued, the parties shall thereafter accept comparable statistics on the cost of living for the Buffalo, New York area, as they shall be computed and published by an agency of the United States Government, or if the United States Government shall discontinue such statistics, by a responsible financial periodical of recognized authority then to be selected by the parties. If the parties cannot agree upon a selection of appropriate comparable statistics, within 60 days of the end of the current index quarter, that selection shall be determined by reference to, and under the rules of, American Arbitration Association.

2. National and City Indexes

The CPI most often used is the U.S. Cities average, all items, published monthly during the third week of the following month by the U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS), in Washington, D.C., and in 10 regional offices.

This CPI, on a base of 1967=100, measures the average changes in prices of about 400 items of goods and services in five categories: food, housing, apparel and upkeep, transportation, and health and recreation. The prices are obtained monthly in 56 sampling areas and then averaged for the month.

Published in addition to the national average are the details of price change by category, e.g., food, and item, as well as city indexes for 23 cities or Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas (SMSA's). The publishing schedule is as follows:

> 1. Every month-city average: Chicago, Ill.-Northwestern Ind.; Detroit, Mich.; Los Angeles-Long Beach, Calif.; New York, N.Y.-Northeastern N.J.; and Philadelphia, Pa.-N.J.
> 2. January, April, July, October: Boston, Mass.; Houston, Texas; Minneapolis-St. Paul, Minn.; and Pittsburgh, Pa.
> 3. February, May, August, November: Buffalo, N.Y.; Cleveland, Ohio; Dallas, Texas; Milwaukee, Wis.; San Diego, Calif.; Seattle, Wash.; and Washington, D.C.-Md.-Va.
> 4. March, June, September, December: Atlanta, Ga.; Baltimore, Md.; Cincinnati, Ohio-Ky.; Honolulu, Hawaii; Kansas City, Mo.-Kans.; St. Louis, Mo.-Ill.; and San Francisco-Oakland, Calif.

City calendar year averages, published in late January, reflect the average of 12 monthly city indexes on the every month schedule and a weighted average for cities on quarterly cycles. Owing to the weights, an average computed from four city indexes published during the year will probably differ from the BLS calendar year average for the cyclical cities.

The example below illustrates the use of the national CPI, along with two city indexes published every month.

> The parties hereto agree to use the Consumer Price Index (1967 equals 100) prepared by the U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, upon all items listed on the index and to prepare therefrom an annual average increase determined on the percentage of change of all items taken from the Detroit area, Chicago area, and the total United States.

TIME PERIODS AND CHANGE MEASUREMENT

1. Measurement Periods

The time period over which change in the index is measured should be as short as can be agreed upon and measurement should occur as often as possible. Change is commonly measured over a quarter, six months or midyear, calendar year, or contract year. Clause language should stipulate a base month CPI, as in this excerpt:

> It is agreed that the Consumer Price Index, All Items, Philadelphia Metropolitan Area for April, 1973, was 133.4 on a 1967 base of 100.

Measurement should then be specified to an end-of-period month CPI, since the CPI is not issued for any specific day in the month but for the whole month. If in the example above the period were one year, language would refer to the CPI for April 1974 as the end of the period mark.

Whatever the period, it is safest to stipulate the base month and year, the end-of-period month and year, and the effective date of the increase as often as necessary to avoid misinterpretation. It is advisable to construct a table listing all the dates and the interrelationships among them. An example of one possible table appears in the closely related discussion on the wage adjustment period. Keep in mind that the CPI for a given month is not published until the third week of the following month, about a two-month lag.

2. Formulas for Measuring Change

Index change over a given period can be measured in a number of ways, the most advantageous being the point difference: New CPI minus old CPI equals point change.

The concept of the point difference as a measure of percentage increase is legitimate because the CPI itself is a percentage (the index measures the rate of change in prices, hence is expressed as a percentage). Point change is popular in labor contracts where the point difference is usually pegged to a cent increase in hourly wages, as in: 0.4 points rise in the CPI equals 1 cent increase.

A second method, popular in teacher contracts, is the BLS formula for computing percent change:

The Michigan Education Association's suggested clause modifies the percent change formula to arrive at a factor to multiply each salary by:

$$\frac{\text{New CPI}}{\text{Old CPI}} = \text{factor}$$

Factor X old salary = new salary

The following example works like the Michigan formula but subtracts the integer 1 which gives the same result as the BLS formula:

Changes in cost of living shall be based upon the consumer price index (referred to as index) for Buffalo, New York for all items of the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor for the quarter ending with the last day of February of the year preceding the year in which the calculations are made (referred to as base quarter), and for the quarter ending with the last day of February in the year in which the calculations are made (referred to as current index quarter). The number for the current index quarter shall be divided by the number for the base quarter. From the quotient thereof shall be subtracted the integer 1, and any resulting numbers shall be deemed to be the percentage of increase or decrease in the cost of living.

Examples of the use of averaging techniques are as follows:

The U.S. Consumer Price Index all items summary of retail prices, as published by the U.S. Department of Labor shall be used. The percentage gain or loss shall be calculated by dividing the annual average index for the period June, 1973, through May, 1974, by the annual average index for the period June, 1972, through May, 1973.

The Consumer Price Index to be used shall be for the area described as New York-Northeastern New Jersey and shall be based upon the percentage increase between the January, 1973 index (U.S. Department of Labor Release of February, 1973) and the January, 1974 index (U.S. Department of Labor Release of February 1974) plus the percentage increase between the February 1973 index (U.S. Department of Labor Release of March, 1973) and the February, 1974 index (U.S. Department of Labor Release of March, 1974) divided by two.

Index comparisons will be made between the average Consumer Price Index (National Average) for the 12-month period April, 1973 through March, 1974, with the Average Consumer Price Index 12-month period April, 1974 through March, 1975. If 1973-74 average 12-month index exceeds the 1974-75 average 12-month index, the 1975-76 salary or wage schedules as published do not change. If the 1974-75 average 12-month index exceeds the 1973-74 average 12-month index the difference divided by the 1973-74 average 12-month index will be the percent increase.

When considering averages of city indexes, care must be used that the necessary indexes are available in the same month. The example below is from a provision measuring quarterly change, yet the two city indexes cited are on different quarterly cycles.

For the purpose of this Section, Consumer Price Index shall mean the Consumer Price Index as reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, U.S. Department of Labor for All Items—Washington, D.C. and All Items—Baltimore, Maryland, averaged and expressed to the nearest tenth of one (1) per cent.

A third category of change formulas employs averages such as the average of monthly CPI figures (national or city) over a quarter, a calendar year, 12 months, or two 12-month periods. Averages of point or percent differences over similar periods are also common.

The use of averages reflects attempts to hedge against unfavorable fluctuations in CPI's and rates of point or percent change. Since no fail-safe method for predicting change exists, it is difficult to establish whether the use of averages will produce the most effective measure of change. The experience of the past five years, detailed in Table 1, suggests that during periods of declining rates of change (as from 1970 to mid-1972) the average of a calendar year, or other average of percents over 12 months, was higher than at least half of the percent changes of one month over the same month in a prior year. However, the rates of monthly percent change (from same month, prior year) have increased since the latter part of 1972, so averages of percents over 12 months will be lower than the latest available percent change of a month over the same month in the prior year. For example, the calendar year 1973 CPI was 6.2 percent higher than 1972, but December 1973 was 8.8 percent higher than December 1972.

3. Wage Adjustment Period

The time period for change measurement and wage measurement are likely to be the same in length, but it is important to stipulate how the adjustment period relates to the change period measured. For example, change is

*Percent change of the month's CPI from the same month's CPI of the previous year. To complete the series for the last quarter 1974, follow this example for October:

$$\frac{\text{October 1974 CPI} - \text{October 1973 CPI}}{\text{October 1973 CPI}} \times 100\% = \%\ \text{change}$$

measured over the past calendar year by using the percent change and an adjustment is paid as of the next contract year. The wage adjustment is sometimes dependent on a "trigger" CPI mark, as in the sample below. Although a bit vague as to operation, the clause apparently calls for an adjustment in any month the CPI rises one full percentage point:

A method of adjusting salaries to the Nation's economy by increasing salaries each time the National Consumer Price Index moves up a full percentage point. Salaries will be composed of a base salary plus a Cost of Living Adjustment, providing built-in protection against inflation. The month after the National Consumer Price Index changes by a full percentage point, an Employee's salary will be adjusted accordingly.

4. Effective Date of Adjustment

Special care should be taken to cite the date(s) on which the salary adjustment or revised salary schedule is to take effect. Obvious dates include the contract anniversary date, a predetermined date for revision(s), or a variable time limit for payment following a set change in the CPI, e.g., salaries would be adjusted within 10 days of a full point increase in the national CPI. Examples appear below:

The 1974-75 salary schedule shall take effect commencing with August 26, 1974.

Effective July 1, 1972, the salary schedule will be improved by a cost-of-living increase equivalent to the increase in the Consumer Price Index for the Washington Metropolitan Statistical Area, published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, U.S. Department of Labor, for the twelve-month period ending August 1, 1971, plus one hundred dollars on each step. In addition, unit members will receive a step increase on the salary schedule for which they are eligible.

The example below provides for quarterly escalation and clearly relates the measurement period, the wage adjustment period, and effective dates through the use of a table.

The percent change formula is defined and an example of the computation is provided:

The Cost of Living Allowance will be determined in accordance with changes in the official Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers (including Single Workers), published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, U.S. Department of Labor, (calculated on 1967 = 100), and hereinafter referred to as the BLS Consumer Price Index.

A	B
Based Upon BLS Consumer Price Index; quarter Ending:	Lump Sum Adjustment Made on First Payday after
September 30	November 15
December 31	February 15
March 31	May 15
June 30	August 15

The amount of the Cost of Living Allowance shall be computed by subtracting the CPI for July 1 from the CPI of the base dates given in column A above. The difference will be multiplied by 100 and the resulting product will be divided by the CPI for July 1, 1971. This quotient, rounded to the nearest .1, shall be the percentage increase for that quarter. Salary adjustment will be calculated, using this percentage of the teachers basic salary according to Appendix A for the days worked during that quarter.

Example

Base Dates	CPI
July 1, 1971	120.1
December 31, 1971	123.7
Difference	3.6

$$\frac{3.6 \times 100}{120.1} = 3.0\%$$

APPLICATION OF THE ADJUSTMENT

1. Application Methods

The application of the COL adjustment involves major decisions in two basic areas. The first concerns the method of the application with regard to base salary, annual increments, growth increments, bonuses for additional degrees, maximum steps, new hires, transfers, and any other salary variables. Equitable distribution of a COL adjustment hinges on its application to all variables.

The second area deals with the sequence of the application: Is the COL increase to be applied to current salaries or after salary improvement, step, and/or increment movement? The latter provides the larger increase for most individual salaries, given the same COL adjustment, and should be the association's first choice.

Focusing on the likely contrasting positions in construction of a year-end COL adjustment will illustrate the pros and cons implicit in sequence selection. School boards in this case will seek to limit the application to current salaries, using the rationale that inflation has diminished buying power of salaries in effect during the one-year COL measurement period. If school boards were willing to grant retroactive adjustments or absolute parity lump-sum payments, sufficient protection might be gained relative to current salaries. However, owing to the time lag in CPI availability and time constraints imposed by budget development processes, the COL measurement period in most provisions is not extended into the summer months and is inadequate to gauge the inflationary impact on current salaries.

Application of the COL adjustment after base salary increases and step movement, the association goal, results in new salaries being paid with inflation protected dollars. Since buying power lost over year-long periods can never be fully recuperated, associations gain more for members in the inflation struggle with the method described. Only an escalator during the year, e.g., quarterly or mid-year, provides a better advantage. Even with the escalators, however, the last adjustment before annual schedule improvement and step movement, should be applied after the increases in order to start the new salary year with constant dollars.

The examples to follow exhibit the wide variety of COL adjustments in present use; others are listed in the taxonomy.

In the following example the total salary budget is improved by 5 percent to finance the cost of increments and to improve individual salaries for the second year. A COL percent increase is stipulated on the basis of the percent increase of the CPI exceeding 5 percent and one-half the percent difference under the 5 percent mark:

The negotiated and settled salary schedule for 1973-1974 shall be based on a total increase of 5% to contract salaries calculated on the sum of contract salaries of K-12 teachers employed on December 1, 1972. The resulting dollar amount, arrived at by the 5% multiplication of the contract amounts on the stipulated date, shall first be used to finance the cost of increment for moving eligible teachers to their next year of service level. The remaining dollar amount after the deduction for the cost of increment shall then be divided by the total number of teachers included in the contract calculations (K-12) as of December 1, 1972, with the resulting amount applied to each step of the 1972-1973 salary schedule. The resulting dollar amount shall also be applied to teachers at the Moorhead Area Technical School.

It is further agreed that under the same formula and method of calculation a cost of living factor will be included, provided the cost of living factor of the Chicago Department of Labor Office as adjusted to the Minneapolis, Minnesota, area for the one-year period ending February 1, 1973, reflects an increase in excess of 5%. The total calculation shall be increased to the said cost of living percentage or factor, and in the event the cost of living factor is below 5%, the total shall be decreased by one half of the percentage difference. (i.e., 6% cost of living increase = 6% total or 4% cost of living increase = 4.5% total).

The following example provides for 5 percent improvement in the second year for all individual salaries and a mid-year COL adjustment limited to a percent increase of 6 percent:

For the 1971-1972 school year, the salary amounts set forth in attached Schedules A, B, and C (except summer substitute teachers) and Group D (coaches) in Schedule D, shall be increased effective July 1, 1971, five per cent (5%). Effective the first (1st) day of the second semester in 1972, the then current schedules will be further increased by the amount of the percentage increase, if any, in the U.S. Department of Labor Consumer Price Index (CPI)—U.S. Average-Measured from July, 1971 to January, 1972; such increase, if any, to remain in effect for the remaining term of this Agreement. The above described "Cost of Living Adjustment" shall not exceed six per cent (6%). The per cent of increase will be determined by dividing the number of points increase in the CPI between July, 1971 and January, 1972, by the number of points on the CPI for July, 1971.

Choice between a 4 percent guaranteed increase or the CPI percent increases plus 1 percent, in addition to increments, is called for in the following:

1974-75 Salary Schedule—Salary provisions for the 1974-75 school year will be increased by raising the base of the salary index either 4% or the percentage increase in the Consumer Price Index plus 1% whichever is greater, plus increment.

Three options appear in this sample, but note the vagueness of the first, the COL option:

Base on Bachelor Schedule—choice to be made no later than May 15, 1971. Choices as follows:
a. Cost of living for period from March 1, 1970 to March 1, 197; (Eastern Sea Board—Bureau of Labor Statistics)
b. Base of $7,200
c. Match highest base of Cortland County Schools, (Cortland, Homer, Cincinnatus, Marathon), as established by May 15, 1971 determination date.

This next example specifies a 4 percent increase for all steps and a COL increase for any percent increase in the CPI over 4 percent, up to a 6 percent maximum:

For the 1974-75 school year, the 1973-74 Teacher Salary Schedule shall be increased a minimum of 4% at all steps and degree levels, with the exception of the 1 L/CM and 2 L/CM steps, which shall be $400 and $1,000 above step 11 for the appropriate degree level respectively.

If the cost of living increases more than 4%, the 1974-75 Teacher Salary Schedule shall be increased from the 1973-74 schedule proportionally, to a maximum increase of not to exceed 6%.

A COL adjustment is made in the second year, with no additional improvement in the example below. Since a dollar increase is stipulated, however, the clause apparently calls for dollar improvment regardless of the COL variable. Note that provision is made for those on maximum steps:

For the 1974-75 school year, the salary for each professional employee shall be adjusted by the average percentage of increase in the cost of living for the calendar year 1973 over the calendar year 1972 as determined from the Revised Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers, Philadelphia, Pa., Series A-05 published monthly by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. This increase shall not be less than $300.00 for any teacher. In addition for 1974-75 all maximum salaries shall be adjusted by the same percentage.

2. Limits

Teacher negotiators should not accept language that calls for a decrease in salaries if a decrease occurs in the CPI. In the early days of the labor sector COL provisions, a "floor" was agreed to below which salaries would not be reduced. Today negotiators refuse to consider reductions and use the term "floor" to indicate a mark which the CPI must pass before an increase is applied, as in:

If the percent increase is 4% or less, the salary or wage schedule as published will not change.
If this percent increase exceeds 4%, the amount over 4% becomes the adjustment factor. This will be multiplied by the 1974-75 salary or wage schedules as a salary or wage adjustment. This adjustment will be added to the published salary schedule for 1975-76.

With rates of inflation increasing, school boards could pressure for a ceiling or maximum on COL increases, as well as a high floor to minimize the effect of large rises in the CPI. Teacher associations should anticipate the floor concept and counter with proposals for a guaranteed minimum percent or dollar amount. The COL adjustment may then become operative following the agreed-upon formula. Agreement to minimums and maximums may check school-board arguments relating to budgeting problems posed by "open-ended" COL clauses. Guaranteed minimums within the context of COL provisions, should not be considered as salary improvement or additional professional growth increments.

In the example below, an increase of 1.7 percent was negotiated, thus raising the stated base to $8,850; the minimum and maximum increases were stipulated:

Salary Schedule for 1973-74 will be based on the percentage increase in the cost of living as reflected in the Detroit area Consumer Price Index. The formula used will be the average of the percentage increases from September 1972 to May 1973. The increase will not be less than 2% or greater than 5%. The starting salary will be $8,850.

3. Additional Improvement or General Increase

Since COL adjustments merely keep salaries in pace with inflation during a given period, an additional improvement factor should be negotiated to provide the general increase in subsequent years of a multiyear contract. In the example below, all steps are improved by a dollar amount and a COL adjustment is provided for to protect the previous year's salaries:

The Salary Schedule for the school year 1974-75 shall be that of the one for the 1973-1974 year with each step increased by $100 and a percentage equal to the percentage increase of the cost of living for the Philadelphia area from July 1, 1973 to June 30, 1974, as published by the United States Department of Labor Statistics. Each teacher will earn his proper step increase where applicable.

Although a decrease is allowed, the clause below clearly distinguishes among a COL adjustment, an improvement increase, and a percentage professional growth factor:

The Board shall establish and implement each year, i.e. 1973-74, 1974-75, a salary schedule which will incorporate adjustments to the current effective salary schedule as follows:

a. The annual cost of living percentage increase or decrease as published in the April publication of the Consumer Price Index, United States City Evaluation, U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics.

b. To the cost of living shall be added a .5% improvement factor.

c. The sum of the percentages presented in a and b shall be applied to the prevailing salary schedule base rates, after which shall be applied the 4.3% professional growth factor.

The following excerpt relates to a salary schedule with no intermediate lanes, since additional preparation levels are awarded bonuses; separate increases in these bonuses are detailed:

The teachers' salary schedule for the 1974-1975 school year shall be the schedule adopted in negotiations for 1973-1974 increased by the increase in the Consumer Price Index (CPI) for the one year period from November, 1972, to November, 1973, but in no event exceeding 5.5 per cent of such schedules. The above referenced increases are to be effected in addition to the increments.

A teacher who holds 30 semester hours of course credit approved by the Superintendent, above or in addition to those hours required and used for the master's degree shall receive $350 more than his regular salary effective July 1, 1973, and $450 more than his regular salary effective July 1, 1974.

A teacher who holds 60 semester hours of course credit, approved by the Superintendent, above or in addition to those hours required and used for the master's degree shall receive $700 more than his regular salary effective July 1, 1973, and $800 more than his regular salary effective July 1, 1974.

A teacher who holds a Ph.D. or Ed.D. degree shall receive $1,360 in addition to his regular salary effective July 1, 1973, and $1,460 in addition to his regular salary effective July 1, 1974.

4. Effective on Salary Schedule

Language should make clear that a COL adjustment is a permanent change in the schedule; the COL increase means more dollars paid to an individual but these should be considered as constant dollars relative to a base. If lump-sum amounts have been paid as COL adjustments, the payments should be totaled to arrive at a figure which revises salary schedule steps upward to a new base.

The example here consolidates COL adjustments to achieve a revised base wage rate:

As soon as reasonably possible after July 1, 1972, and July 1, 1973, the total accumulated cost of living adjustment for the prior year of July 1 through June 30 as provided, not to exceed the applicable maximum amount, shall be added to each employee's base wage rate.

The example below details the construction of the new salary schedule on the basis of COL adjustment with a guaranteed minimum of 3%, up to a ceiling of 6%. Although there is no provision for an additional salary increase, the COL adjustment is combined with a reopener triggered by a 7.3% increase in the CPI.

The salary schedule for 1974-75 shall be determined according to the following procedure:

1. Each step on the 1973-74 schedule shall be increased by a percentage equal to the percentage increase in the Consumer's Price Index from a base of July 1973 to July 1974, providing, however, that the increase will not be less than 3% or more than 6% unless the wage portion of the contract is reopened as provided in No. 4 below.
2. The Consumer's Price Index is defined as the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported using 1967=100 as a base. The July 1973 index figure for the United States city average is 132.7.
3. In determining the percentage increase, the following method will be used:

$$\frac{\text{July 1974 index}}{132.7} - 132.7 = \%\ \text{increase}$$

The percentage increase will be calculated to two places and rounded to the nearest one place, e.g., 5.44% equals 5.4; 5.45% equals 5.5%.
4. In the event that the percentage increase exceeds 7.3% (percentage to be calculated as in No. 3 above) the parties agree to open only the salary portion of the contract, with a guarantee of at least 6% at each step.

The following provisions are intended to present an array of the three types of wage improvement provisions being negotiated in the public and private sectors. None is advocated; however, the wide assortment of contract language and variations in dealing with wage improvement is intended as "boiler plate" language for adaptation to particular situations. The provisions have been extracted from state education association and union models where available, as well as from existing union contracts from both the public and private sectors.

COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS

Single Increase

A. On the ____ day of September 19 ___, each step of the salary schedule (Appendix ____), shall be increased by a factor to be computed as follows:

1. Divide the July 1974 Consumer Price Index by the July 1973 Consumer Price Index.
2. The factor shall be rounded to the nearest one-thousandth.

Example:
July 1974 CPI estimate = 143.3
July 1973 CPI = 132.7
143.3 ÷ 132.7 = 1.0798
1.0798 x each step of the salary schedule

B. The Consumer Price Index is defined as the (Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers, (1) U.S. Cities or (2) Detroit) published monthly by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, United States Department of Labor.

C. In addition to the above computation, on the ____ day of July 19 ____, each step of the salary schedule shall be increased by ____ % as schedule improvement.

D. In no event shall a reduction in salary occur as a result of this clause.

E. If the Consumer Price Index in its present form and calculated on the same basis shall be revised therefrom or discontinued, the parties shall attempt to determine an appropriate CPI figure by agreement or if agreement is not reached, the parties shall request the Bureau of Labor Statistics to make available a Consumer Price Index in its present form for the appropriate date or dates and calculated on a comparable basis. Any scheduled salary increases delayed by contingencies discussed in this paragraph shall be paid as of the first regular pay day subsequent to receipt of the delayed CPI information and shall be retroactive to the appropriate calculation date.

Table I

July 1 Adjustment	May CPI ÷ February CPI
October 1 Adjustment	August CPI ÷ May CPI
January 1 Adjustment	November CPI ÷ August CPI
April 1 Adjustment	February CPI ÷ November CPI

Ceiling

A. In no case shall the cost-of-living increase as defined in this Section be less than ___% nor more than ___%.

Quarterly Increases

A. For the duration of this Agreement, each step of the salary schedule as contained in this Agreement (Appendix _____) shall be adjusted on a quarterly basis and shall be calculated as follows:

1. Adjustment dates shall be July 1, October 1, January 1, and April 1.
2. On each adjustment date, the percentage adjustment shall be calculated according to Table 1.

[Michigan Education Association]

COST OF LIVING ESCALATOR CLAUSE

If there is an increase in the Consumer Price Index, the salary schedules shall be increased at each step to compensate therefor. The percentage constituting the cost of living adjustment shall be determined by the bargaining agent and certified to the employer. The method to calculate the percent change shall be as follows:

1. The index to be referred to is the Consumer Price Index—United States City Average—All Items, published by the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics. If the publication of the B.L.S.—C.P.I. Index should be discontinued, the parties shall mutually select another financial periodical of recognized authority. If the parties cannot agree upon a selection of appropriate comparable statistics within 30 days, that selection shall be determined by reference to and under the rules of the American Arbitration Association.

2. The percentage of increase, if any, shall be determined by computing the All Items Index from the base month of _____ 197__ to _____ 197___, calculating the percent change over the base paid, if any, by which the index has increased. (See example below)

3. The parties may, by mutual agreement, desire to alter the months to be considered in determining the average when making the comparative measurement.

4. Under no circumstances shall the columns in the salary schedule, by step, be lower than _____.

EXAMPLE

$$\frac{\text{November 1973} - \text{November 1972}}{\text{November 1972}} = \frac{\text{Index Point Difference}}{\text{Base}} \times 100 = X$$

$$\frac{137.6 - 126.9}{126.9} = .084 \times 100 = 8.4$$

COST OF LIVING

All employees covered by this Agreement shall be covered by the provisions for a cost-of-living allowance, as set forth in the section.

The amount of the cost-of-living allowance shall be determined and redetermined as provided below on the basis of the "Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers (All Items) Published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, U.S. Department of Labor (1957-1959 = 100)" and referred to herein as the "Index."

The first cost-of-living allowance shall be effective the first pay period beginning on or after July 1, 1971, based on the difference between the Index figure of March, 1970, and the Index figure for February, 1971, and shall continue in effect until the first pay period beginning on and after July 1, 1972.

The second cost-of-living allowance shall be effective the first pay period beginning on and after July 1, 1972, based on the difference between the Index figure of March, 1971, and the Index figure for February, 1972, and shall continue in effect to and including June 30, 1973. Adjustments in the cost-of-living allowance shall be made on the basis of changes in the Index as follows:

First Allowance:

There shall be a $.01 per hour or .25 mill per mile adjustment for every .3 point increase in the Index.

For example:	Allowance Per Hour	Allowance Per Mile
First .3 point	1¢	.25 mill
Second .3 point	2¢	.50 mill
Third .3 point	3¢	.75 mill

There shall be a $.01 per hour or .25 mill per mile adjustment for every .3 point increase in the Index.

There shall be a maximum of $.08 payable under each of the two allowances.

In the event that the Bureau of Labor Statistics shall not issue the appropriate Index on or before the beginning of one of the pay periods referred to herein, any adjustment in the allowance required by such Index shall be effective at the beginning of the first pay period after receipt of such Index. No adjustments, retroactive or otherwise, shall be made in the amount of the cost-of-living allowance due to any revision which later may be made in the published figures for the Index for any month on the basis of which the allowance has been determined. The cost-of-living allowance shall not become a fixed part of the base rates for any classification.

A decline in the Index shall not result in a reduction of classification base rates.

Continuance of the cost-of-living allowance shall be contingent upon the continued availability of official monthly Bureau of Labor Statistics Price Index in its present form and calculated on the same basis as Index for 1965 unless otherwise agreed upon by the parties.

COST OF LIVING ESCALATOR – TWO-YEAR

The increases in the 1976-77 salary schedule shall be computed in the following manner:

1. The 1976-77 salary schedule base shall be the 1975-76 base plus the percent of increase in the cost of living plus _____($_____) dollars.

The cost of living index as issued by the Department of Labor will be recorded as of September, 1970 and as of January 1972.

If the cost of living index as of January, 1972, is higher than the index as of September, 1970, the Bellefontaine City Board of Education agrees to enter into negotiations with the Bellefontaine Education Association to determine the B. A. minimum to be effective September 1, 1972. Under no circumstance is the B. A. Minimum to be lower than $6500.00

COST OF LIVING ALLOWANCE

In addition to the wage rates of each employee, and subject to the conditions and provisions set forth in this section, a cost-of-living allowance shall be paid to such employee, based upon changes in the cost-of-living, as follows:

(a) The cost-of-living allowance, if any, shall be determined in accordance with changes in the Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers (1967 = 100) United States City Average published monthly by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, United States Department of Labor, and hereinafter referred to as the Price Index.

(b) Adjustments or readjustments in the cost-of-living allowance, if any, shall be made quarterly during the period beginning with the fourth month of this agreement at the following times.

Effective Date of Cost Of Living Adjustment (first pay period beginning on or after)	Based On Price Index For:
February 1, 1974	December, 1973
May 1, 1974	March, 1974
August 1, 1974	June, 1974
November 1, 1974	September, 1974
February 1, 1975	December, 1974

In the event the Bureau of Labor Statistics does not issue the Price Index on or before the beginning of the pay period referred to above, any adjustment required will be made at the beginning of the first pay period after publication of the Price Index. No adjustment, retroactive or otherwise, shall be made because of any revision which may later be made in the published Price Index.

(c) The amount of the cost of living allowance which shall be effective for any three (3) month quarterly period as provided in paragraph (b) above shall be in accordance with the following tables:

Bureau of Labor Statistics Consumer Price Index	Cost of Living Allowance

and so forth, with 1 cent (1¢) adjustment for each additional .4 point change in the Price Index.

(d) In no event will a decline in the Price Index below 138.5 provide the basis for a reduction in the job classification wage rate.

The amount of any cost-of-living allowance in effect at the time shall be included in computing overtime payment, vacations and holiday payment, sick leave payment, and longevity pay.

If the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Consumer Price Index in its present form and calculated on the same basis shall be revised therefrom or discontinued, the parties shall attempt to adjust this change, or, if agreement is not reached, the parties shall request the Bureau of Labor Statistics to provide an appropriate conversion of the allowance which shall be applicable as of the appropriate allowance date and thereafter.

COST-OF-LIVING ALLOWANCE

Each employee covered by this Agreement shall receive a cost-of-living allowance based on the BLS National Consumer Price Index (1967 = 100), hereinafter referred to as the C. P. I., in accordance with the following:

1. Effective July 23, 1972, an adjustment will be made in all basic weekly rates. The amount of the adjustment shall be as indicated in the following table based on the C.P.I. for May, 1972. (No downward adjustment is to be made.)

2. Effective July 22, 1973, a second adjustment will be made in all basic weekly rates. The amount of the adjustment shall be as indicated in the following table based on the C.P.I. for May, 1973, less the adjustment made in (1) above. (No downward adjustment is to be made.)

3. Cost-of-living allowances shall be included in "basic rates" for purposes of all computations.

4. In the event the Bureau of Labor Statistics does not issue the appropriate C.P.I. on or before the dates referred to in (1) and (2) above, any adjustment in the cost-of-living allowance required by such appropriate indexes shall be effective at the beginning of the first pay period after receipt of the indexes.

5. No adjustments, retroactive or otherwise, shall be made as the result of any revision which may later be made in the published figures for the C.P.I. for the dates referred to in (1) and (2) above.

6. The parties to this Agreement agree that the cost-of-living allowance is dependent upon the availability of the C.P.I. in its present form and calculated on the same basis as the index for May, 1971, unless otherwise agreed upon by the parties. If the Bureau of Labor Statistics changes the form or the basis of calculating the C.P.I., the parties agree to request the Bureau to make available, for the life of this Agreement, a C.P.I. in its present form and calculated on the same basis as the index for May, 1971 (1967 = 100).

CASE REVIEWS

HAWAII

Fine Against Hawaii State Teachers Association Reduced

The Hawaii Supreme Court reduced to $100,000 a $190,000 fine assessed against the Hawaii State Teachers Association (HSTA) for violating a preliminary injunction against striking because the issues in the case had never been litigated previously and the new laws governing collective bargaining among public employees were very complex. A lower court enjoined HSTA from striking after the Hawaii Public Employment Relations Board (HPERB) ruled that HSTA was guilty of failure to bargain in good faith with the Hawaii Board of Education. HSTA appealed to HPERB, contending that the parties were at an impasse. HPERB upheld HSTA's allegation, but the above-mentioned lower court overturned the ruling on the ground that HSTA had failed to bargain in good faith, and without good faith bargaining on the part of HSTA, there could be no finding of an impasse. HSTA went on strike and was found in contempt of the court injunction and fined $190,000.

HSTA appealed the validity of the contempt order and fines, contending that the court lacked jurisdiction to determine whether the parties had reached an impasse and that the court decision was being appealed at the time that the fine was levied.

The Hawaii Supreme Court ruled that the lower court had acted within its jurisdiction and that HSTA was bound by its decision until its decision was reversed for error by itself or by a higher court. Additionally, the court ruled that the contempt order was valid when the strike occurred since the injunction covered the duration of the contract between the parties, and that HSTA did not qualify for exception from the order since it had not attempted to bargain in good faith prior to the strike.

Although the Hawaii Supreme Court upheld the lower court decision, it decided to reduce the fine levied against the HSTA because "HSTA acted as the 'legal trail-blazer' in an uncharted, complicated, new legal field of collective bargaining among the public employees in the State of Hawaii." (Hawaii Public Employment Relations Board, State of Hawaii, Plaintiff-Appellee v. Hawaii State Teachers Association et al., Defendants-Appellants, Hawaii Supreme Court, March 24, 1974.)

ILLINOIS

Public Employee Strikes Enjoinable

In a case between the city of Pana and the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, the Illinois State Superior Court reversed an appellate court ruling[a] that public employee strikes may not be enjoined. The superior court held that the state anti-injunction act was inapplicable because public employee strikes were illegal.

When the employees of the city of Pana went on strike, the circuit court granted the city's motion to enjoin the employees from engaging in any form of cessation of work.

The AFSCME appealed, arguing that the provision in the anti-injunction act whereby the issuance of an injunction in a dispute over terms and conditions of employment, by any state court was prohibited. Accordingly, an appellate court reversed the decision of the lower court.

Contending that the anti-injunction act was not intended to apply to work stoppages among government employees which had been and still were universally considered unlawful, and asserting that the corresponding federal statute, the Norris LaGuardia Act, has been held to be inapplicable to federal government employees, the supreme court concluded that the strike was enjoinable in that it was illegal and presented imminent danger to the welfare of the citizens. (City of Pana v. Harold Crowe et al., Illinois Supreme Court, May 20, 1974.)

MINNESOTA

Arbitration Ordered for Teacher Denied Annual Increment and Salary Increase

Dissolving a temporary restraining order which stalled arbitration proceedings, the Minnesota District Court ruled that a teacher was entitled to judgment and ordered the parties to proceed to arbitration on the matter of a denial of an increment and negotiated salary increase.

The parties' agreement stated that the salary schedule was not a part of the continuing contract, that the board reserved the right to withhold any salary increases for disciplinary reasons, and that this provision was subject to the grievance procedure and applied only for just cause.

The teacher alleged that just cause was not established and filed a grievance contending that she complied with the contract procedure in processing the grievance to arbitration.

The board contended that the teacher did not comply with procedures and secured a stay of arbitration shortly before the hearing before the American Arbitration Association was to begin.

In its memorandum, the court held that the state supreme court adheres to a rule which permits the courts to review arbitration cases only after arbitration. The exception to that rule is in cases where no contract exists or an existing contract was induced by fraud.

In the case at bar, the court found that there was a contract to arbitrate the grievance, and held that the question was whether the procedures were properly followed to invoke the arbitration mechanism. Accordingly, the court held that the arbitration panel should first determine the arbitrability of the case, and that if the arbitration panel assumed jurisdiction, the court could review the arbitrator's decision on appeal.

The court, therefore, ordered the temporary restraining order be dissolved and the parties to proceed to arbitration. (Independent school District No. 204, Kasson-Mantorville Schools, v. Dorthy N. Johnson, Minnesota District Court, June 6, 1974.)

NEW YORK

Arbitration Is Prerequisite to Court Proceeding

Under New York State law, any dispute arising within the scope of a valid collective bargaining agreement that provides for arbitration must be submitted to arbitration as a prerequisite to any court proceeding. Unless the agreement clearly excludes a given issue from arbitration, the question of arbitrability is for the arbitrator rather than the courts to decide. The courts will enjoin arbitration under such an agreement only when (a) there is fraud or duress, (b) there is no valid dispute between the parties, (c) the performance which is the subject for the demand for arbitration is prohibited, and (d) a contractural prerequisite to arbitration has not been fulfilled. Accordingly, the supreme court denied the request of the Connequot Board of Education that arbitration demanded by the Connequot Teachers Association be stayed.

The Association had requested arbitration on two unrelated issues. The board of education went to court seeking a stay of arbitration on the grounds that the Association had no standing under the contract to request arbitration, and that it had improperly combined two issues which had no common basis in law or fact. The Association contended that it did have standing and that it wished to have each of the issues arbitrated separately.

Ruling in favor of the Association, the court stated that the contract gave the Association standing to demand arbitration, and that the two issues could be included in the same demand, provided they were arbitrated separately. Finally, the Court stated that under valid agreements which provide for arbitration, arbitration is a prerequisite to any court proceeding for all disputes arising within the scope of the contract, and that a stay could be granted only in case of fraud or duress, the absense of a valid dispute, a demand for performing a prohibited act, or failure to fulfill a contractual prerequisite to arbitration. (Matter of Board of Education and Connequot Teachers Association, New York Supreme Court, Suffolk County, March 14, 1974.)

No Binding Agreement Exists Unless Parties Agree on Language To Be Used

No binding agreement exists unless the parties have agreed upon the language to be used in the contract. Therefore, the New York State Supreme Court granted a stay of arbitration which had been sought by the White Plains Teachers Association.

The Association and the city of White Plains had executed a memorandum of agreement in which the parties agreed to submit disputes over the proper language of the contract to arbitration. However, at the top of the memorandum, the following was written: "Outline form only—subj. to lang. and approval of B of E and ratification by Tchrs. Assn."

When a dispute occurred, the Association refused to submit it to arbitration. The board sought and received an order from a lower state court directing the Association to implement the memorandum. The Association appealed.

Upon appeal, the supreme court ruled in favor of the Association, stating that "there could be no binding agreement where the parties had not agreed upon the language to be used in the contract." (City School District, White Plains Respondent v. White Plains Teachers Assn., New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, Second Department, March 18, 1974.)

WISCONSIN

Residency Requirement Affecting Job Security Requires Bargaining

A residency requirement for municipal employees which threatens current nonresident employees with discharge for failure to comply is a condition of employment and subject to mandatory collective bargaining under the Wisconsin Municipal Employment Act. Therefore, the Wisconsin Circuit Court upheld a decision of the Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission which cited the city of Brookfield for unlawful refusal to bargain when the city unilaterally adopted a residency requirement for its municipal employees. WERC ordered the city to bargain on residency requirements with Fire Fighters Local 2051.

When the city enacted a residency requirement for municipal employees, the fire fighters filed a complaint with WERC, charging the city with failure to bargain in good faith. WERC ruled in favor of the fire fighters. The city appealed, contending that the residency requirement was not a subject of mandatory collective bargaining, but a managerial decision, fundamental to the direction of the municipality and that the residence of employees was so important that the policy of self government and public welfare must prevail against policies favoring reduction of labor strife.

Upholding WERC's decision, the court, ruled that the residency requirement affected job security, and was a condition of employment, and noted that previous court rulings had established that (a) any change which directly related to the termination of employment was mandatorily bargainable, and (2) residency requirements constituted a condition of employment and therefore must be considered mandatory bargaining subjects. In addition, the court ruled that an action taken "in direct impingement of job security" was a managerial prerogative of the municipal employer under the Municipal Employment Law, and that any decision by a municipality which conflicts with state or federal statutes is void. (City of Brookfield v. WERC, State of Wisconsin Circuit Court, Waukesha County, June 21, 1974.)

FEDERAL

Sick Leave Usable for Pregnancy-Related Disabilities

Denial of the use of accumulated sick leave for pregnancy-related disability was declared discriminatory and in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution by a U.S. District Court Judge.

A woman teacher, seeking relief through the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), charged that the Lake Oswego School District, No. 7, had denied her request to use her accrued sick leave for her absence for pregnancy-related disability. She contended that a distinction between childbirth-caused disabilities and other medical disabilities discriminated against her on the basis of sex.

The members of the Lake Oswego Board of Education argued that they were not the teacher's employer within the meaning of 42 U.S.C. 2000 e-2(a).

A 1972 amendment to Title VII promoting equal employment opportunities provided coverage for state and municipal employees and educational institutions. As the power to hire is vested with the school board and the school-board members are agents of the district under state law, it was reasoned that they are, therefore, employers. Whereas the school board is immune from suit under the doctrine of sovereign immunity, school-board members are entitled only to qualified immunity for acts performed by them in good faith.

In regard to the teacher's entitlement to use sick leave for a pregnancy-related disability, the school district argued that state law states that pregnancy or childbirth is not an illness or injury. However, the court held that the EEOC had issued guidelines which stipulated that the treatment of maternity disabilities separate from other disabilities was sex discrimination. The court pointed out that in Naran Andreev v. National Broadcasting Company, an attempt to test the EEOC guidelines, it was held that pregnancy must be treated the same as any other illness.

In regard to the Equal Protection Clause, the teacher contended that a distinction between childbirth-caused disabilities and all other disabilities is arbitrary and discriminatory and, therefore, contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The defendants argued that their policies were not sexually discriminatory because pregnancy is a class by itself and the school district's notice of them is not a classification by sex. Because sex is voluntary, they asserted, it is not an illness or injury within the range of dibilitating injuries defined by state law.

Disagreeing with this argument, the court held that since pregnancy is a natural, expectable, foreseeable, and ultimately necessary condition restricted to women, and is not regulated by statutory law but biological law, the regulation penalized women teachers for being women, and must be condemned.

The defendants also argued that granting sick leave for pregnancy-related disabilities would increase administrative costs. The court struck down this argument, citing Aiello v. Hanson, in which it was held that to exclude pregnancy-related disabilities as dibilitating injuries or illness, a state must also prove that the restriction of these disabilities rests upon substantial differences relative to the objective of the legislation. The court reasoned that excluding all pregnancy-related disabilities on the grounds that the claims would be large, places the state in a position of fostering a stereotype concept contrary to the guidelines of the Equal Protection Clause.

Therefore, the court ruled that the board intentionally engaged in an unlawful employment practice in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by discriminating on the basis of sex in its denial of sick leave benefits for childbearing-related disabilities. In addition, the court found the determination of sick leave benefits arbitrary and irrational.

In conclusion, the court held that the doctrine of sovereign immunity was applicable to the school district and that the teacher was entitled to sick leave benefits. It granted the teacher costs and attorneys' fees as relief from discrimination and enjoined the board members from future refusal to allow use of sick leave for pregnancy-related disabilities. BOARD FINDINGS AND RULINGS

CONNECTICUT

School Boards Must Bargain Before Contracting Out Bargaining Unit Work

In two related cases, the Connecticut State Board of Labor Relations ordered the school board to bargain with the organization representing its employees before contracting out bargaining unit work. The cases involved the school boards of Plainville and Southington and AFSCME Local 1303 representing custodians and maintenance workers. In both cases the labor board held that the school board had committed an unfair labor practice by failing to bargain with the union before contracting out the work in existing job categories, and ordered the boards to bargain with the union.

- In the Plainville case, the labor board held that custodial work performed in a new addition to an existing building was bargaining unit work since the work was specified as bargaining unit work in the contract, was performed in part by members of the bargaining unit even after it was contracted out, and was substantially the same as work that was not contracted out in the original building. In addition, members of the bargaining unit performed all maintenance work in the new building.

Having defined bargaining unit work, the labor board stated that when a substantial amount of bargain unit work of a permanent nature is to be contracted out in departure from past practice relating to similar work, and in the absence of a "prospect of intolerably repeated full-scale bargaining," the employer is required to bargain with the union.

- In the Southington case, the school board voted to contract out work before the certification of a newly elected bargaining agent and in the absence of a request to negotiate from the former bargaining agent. The labor board ruled that an employer must initiate bargaining with the union and that the failure of the unions to bring the matter to the bargaining table did not constitute a waiver of its right to have the status quo remain unchanged by unilateral action on the employer's part.

The labor board also ruled that having made an unlawful decision before the certification of the new bargaining agent, the school board was required to review the implementation of that decision with the new bargaining agent and to halt implementation, "until such contracting out is agreed to by the union after negotiation, or until final impasse in such negotiations has been reached." (Plainville Board of Education and AFSCME Local 1303, Connecticut State Board of Labor Relations, January 18, 1974.; Southington Board of Education and AFSCME Local 1303, Connecticut State Board of Labor Relations, May 10, 1974.)

HAWAII

Withholding Seniority Credit from Striking Teachers Upheld

The Hawaii Public Employment Relations Board ruled that the deduction of one month's seniority credit from teacher strike participants, members of the Hawaii State Teachers Association, was not in violation of a strike settlement agreement.

A dissenting HPERB member took issue, stating that the decision could exercise a chilling effect on future legally protected strikes. He also contended that the Board lacked jurisdiction to penalize the Association because the issue involved a breach of contract more appropriately handled through the negotiated grievance procedure.

Acknowledging that the dispute was arbitrable, the HPERB stated that it retained jurisdiction to save money and time which would be in the best interest of both the public and the teachers.

Seniority service credit, which is computed on a half-month paid status basis, operates in favor of employees whose work meets half-month criterion and to the disadvantage of those whose work does not. The Board concluded, nonetheless, that the policy was not discriminatory since it was applied equally to strikers and non-strikers. Also, the Board was of the opinion that the employer properly viewed the strike as unauthorized leaves without pay. Since certain approved leaves do not accrue service credit, it was unreasonable to conclude that the board of education should have granted service credit for absence owing to strikes.

In the absence of clear language in the strike settlement agreement covering seniority and the lack of coverage of it in a reopener, the Board determined that it was without authority to act, other than to sustain the board's policy of deducting seniority credit from striking teachers. Successor Agreement Does Not Bar Petition Filed During the Open Period

The negotiation of a successor agreement before the filing of a petition for a representation election does not invalidate that petition if it was filed during the "open season" between 120 to 60 days before the expiration of the existing contract. Any successor agreement reached before the end of the open period is to be considered premature so as to allow employees the opportunity to review their choice of representatives. The Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission so ruled, upholding the representation petition filed by the Pittsfield Federation of Teachers as timely filed.

The Federation had filed its petition during the open season before the expiration of the contract between the Pittsfield Teachers Association and the Pittsfield School Committee. Before the filing of the petition, a successor agreement had been negotiated by the Association and the school committee and ratified by the Association members.

The school committee and the Association challenged the validity of the petition before the Commission, contending that the petition could not be considered as timely filed because under the Municipal Employee Relations Act "no election can be directed during the term of an existing agreement," and, therefore, the petition was barred by the prior execution of their successor agreement.

Ruling in favor of the Federation, the Commission noted that barring a representation petition filed during the open period on the grounds of prior execution of a successor agreement could permit an employee association to "effectively prevent employees from ever having the opportunity to review their choice of representatives," by executing a successor agreement prior to the open season. Therefore, the Commission held that any agreement negotiated before the end of this period would be considered premature and subject to renegotiation if the employees elected a new bargaining agent. NEW YORK

Recognition Not Terminated When Employer Files an Application for Managerial Status

"A recognition properly granted by an employer may not be withdrawn by the whim of the employer." Under the Taylor law, an employer's recognition of an organization is not terminated by his application for managerial status for his employees who are members of the organization. Nor is there an automatic stay of a PERB decision pending resolution of appeal of its decision to the courts. Therefore, PERB ordered the Hempstead Public Schools, Union Free School District No. 1, to bargain with the Hempstead Schools Association of Administrators on wages and working conditions for building principals.

The Association had filed a complaint with PERB when the school district refused to negotiate, pending resolution of its appeal from a 1973 PERB decision which rejected the district's petition for designation of building principals as managerial employees.

The district contended that (a) having recognized the Association voluntarily, it was free to withdraw recognition on its own, (b) recognition of this Association was terminated with the filing of the district's application for managerial status, and (c) it was not required to negotiate pending the resolution of its appeal.

PERB held that "recognition properly granted by an employer may not be withdrawn at the whim of the employer, but may only be withdrawn if the employer at an appropriate time has objective evidence that the employee organization no longer represents an appropriate unit or enjoys majority status, or if the employer invokes the processes of this Board by way of petition for decertification or certification." It maintained that recognition is accomplished only by final approval of an employer's application and not by the application itself, and becomes effective only upon the end of the period of unchallenged representation. Also, no automatic stay of a PERB decision is provided by reason of appeal from that decision to the courts.

PERB ordered the district to bargain with the Association on wages and working conditions for building principals. (Hempstead Schools Association of Administrators and Hempstead Public Schools, Union Free School District No. 1, PERB, April 1, 1974)

Composition of Evaluation Committee Not Negotiable

In a case involving the Professional Staff Congress (PSC) of CUNY and the Board of Higher Education of the City of New York, PERB ruled that the composition of the Personnel and Budget Committee (PBC) which evaluates college faculty was not a term or condition of employment under the provisions of the Taylor Law, but was a managerial prerogative, not a mandatory subject of negotiations.

During negotiations, PSC demanded contract language barring student membership on P&B's. The Board opposed the demand on its merits and contended that it was not within the scope of mandatory negotiations. PSC submitted the issue to a fact finder who determined that PERB had exclusive jurisdiction over the question of negotiability.

The Board filed a complaint with PERB, charging PSC with refusing to negotiate in good faith by demanding the limitation of student voting on the committee as a condition of agreement. PSC denied any violation, contending that since P&B committees made decisions concerning terms of employment, the composition of them affected those terms, and that the faculty had an interest in the continuation of the long-standing practice of excluding student representation on P&B committees. In addition, PSC contended that peer evaluation was vital to the stability and academic soundness of colleges and that "the faculty must continue to manage."

PERB ruled in favor of the Board, citing Matter of the Board of Education of the City of New York (5 PERB 3094 (1972)), in which it decided that "the assignment of responsibilities to one group of supervisors or another is a management prerogative within the meaning of the Taylor Law; it is a term of employment of the supervisors involved but not of the employees being supervised." PERB also held that "collective negotiation. . .is not designed to resolve policy questions regarding the structure of governance of a public employer or the nature of that public employer's responsibility to its constituency. . .[which involves] issues of social concern to many groups in the community other than the public employer's administrative apparatus and its employees." The use of collective negotiations for such disputes would amount to disenfranchising other interested groups, which "would neither serve the interests of the community nor the requirements of the Taylor Law."

In addition, PERB considered an argument, not raised by PSC, that an employer cannot alter a past practice unilaterally even though it is not within the scope of negotiations. Recognizing that past practice enlarges the scope of negotiations, PERB rejected this argument, noting its decision in Board of Education of the City of New York that "the Taylor Law imposes no obligation upon an employer to maintain a past practice that is not a term or condition of employment even though it may have obligated itself to do so contractually. Also, where there is no contractual obligation, past practice does not enlarge the Taylor Law obligations of an employer to negotiate.

PERB ordered PSC to "cease and desist from insisting that non-mandatory subjects of negotiations be considered by a fact finder. . .[and] from persisting in a demand for a non-mandatory subject after fact finding."

In a dissenting opinion, it was argued that peer evaluation was a mandatory subject of negotiations. Citing NLRB's decision in Matter of Adelphi University, it was noted that "the industrial model does not fit the university. . .while qualifications for employment have been traditionally regarded as a managerial prerogative, an obvious exception would be a university, where the faculty have traditionally participated in their own governance in such matters as hiring, tenure and dismissal." Whereas in Board of Education of the City of New York, the supervisors and the employees were distinct groups, "in the instant case, those rated and those doing the rating are all faculty." Since faculty members rate themselves, that rating is a term and condition of employment. Faculty members here were employed with the understanding that their retention and advancement would initially (but not finally) be decided by their peers.

Additionally, in Matter of Board of Education, City School District of Rochester, PERB stated that "the phrase terms and conditions of employment, is considered to cover any subject which has a 'significant or material relationship' to the conditions of employment, unless it involves decisions concerning the basic goals and direction—the mission--of an employing enterprise." The composition of the faculty evaluation committee does not involve the basic goals or mission of the university. MICHIGAN

Bargaining Through Representatives Upheld

In a decision concerning an alleged refusal to bargain brought by the Detroit College of Business Faculty Association against the Detroit College of Business, the Michigan Employment Relations Commission recommended dismissal of the charges because the Association was unable to produce sufficient evidence of a violation.

Upon affiliation with the Michigan Education Association (MEA), the Detroit College of Business Faculty Association (DCBFA) notified the college that the MEA would in the future provide it with assistance in negotiation and grievance processing. However, the college refused to allow an Association meeting to be held in college facilities upon learning that the principal speaker was to be an MEA representative.

The DCBFA charged that the college engaged in unfair labor practices by refusing to allow MEA to represent it in collective bargaining and other activities with the college. The college contended that the charge should be dismissed because it had not refused to bargain with other than an MEA agent, that the matter should be pursued through grievance procedures as provided by the collective bargaining agreement, and that the college was not required to honor the MEA as agent for the DCBFA.

The MERC agreed that the refusal of the college to negotiate was not because a representative of the affiliate organization was present, but rather because MEA had not notified the college of its intent to represent the DCBFA. Citing the Benton Township decision that public employees are guaranteed the right to assistance from affiliate organizations, MERC held that employee organizations have the right of free choice of representative.

Regarding the contention that the matter should be handled through the grievance procedure in accordance with NLRB's Collyer Insulated Wire doctrine, the Commission disagreed, saying that the right to bargain is a basic right granted by the Labor Mediation Act, but that DCBEA's situation dealt with a bargaining problem arising under a contract which provided for arbitration. Therefore, this right could not be delegated to an arbitrator.

Concluding, the Commission declined to issue a declaratory judgment, recommended that the charges be dismissed, and upheld the right of employees to bargain through representatives of their own choosing. (Detroit College of Business and Detroit College of Business Faculty Association, Michigan Employment Relations Commission, March 28, 1974.)

Teachers Not Required To Work on Day Lost by Inadvertent Class Cancellation

In a dispute between the Lake Fenton Education Association and the Lake Fenton Board of Education, an arbitrator ruled that public-school teachers were not obligated to make up time lost by an inadvertent class cancellation.

Having agreed to extend the school calendar to compensate for time lost during a teachers' strike, the Association objected to the board's unilateral rescheduling of a missed class session and subsequent extension of the final teacher work day. The board president explained that the passage of a state bill which discouraged the holding of strike make-up sessions on Saturday, but encouraged the extension of the school term, precipitated his decision. Such action unintentionally released the teachers from their contractual obligation to work a specified number of days.

While Michigan law requires 180 days of student instruction, the contractual arrangements concerning student instruction days and teacher work days, negotiated between the two parties, was in excess of the minimum standard. Exceptions to the time minimum were allowed for acts of God, and compensatory sessions were required only when these occurrences exceeded five days.

The arbitrator pointed out that the minimum requirement for student days of instruction would be met, and that there was no statutory requirement to reschedule the class in question since this obligation would be necessitated only by an act of God. He also indicated that he was not authorized to amend the bargaining agreement by adding teaching days. Determining that both the contract and the Michigan statutes allowed for time to be missed without any obligation to compensate, and that the teachers were willing to work on the day in question, the arbitrator granted the union's request to set the teacher's workday in accordance with prearrangements. (Lake Fenton Education Association vs. Lake Fenton Board of Education, Michigan Employment Relations Commission, May 16, 1974.)

FEDERAL

Waiver of Initiation Fee Prior to Election Held Legal

A union's offer to waive its initiation fee for all eligible employees prior to a representation election was deemed legal by the National Labor Relations Board. The United Auto Workers offered a pre-election waiver of fees during the course of three meetings and in a handbill distributed to employees. The employer argued that such an offer constituted a restriction on the employees' freedom of choice because the union had thus conditioned the election on the waiver of fees.

An NLRB regional director held that the election was valid and he overruled the timely objections of the employer. The full NLRB supported this decision, citing NLRB v. Savair Mfg. Co. wherein the Supreme Court of the United States characterized such a waiver of initiation fee as the elimination of an artificial obstacle to an employee's freedom of choice in an election, and therefore, held it to be a legitimate interest of the union. Further, the high court held that the availability of the waiver to all employees whether they joined the union before or after the election ensured that the election was not conditioned upon union support during the election.

Noting the absence of a penalty for employees who did not support the union during the campaign or the election, the NLRB held that the election was clearly not conditioned upon expression of support for the union. The availability of the waiver to all current employees did not interfere with their freedom of choice, according to the NLRB, and neither did it affect the outcome of the election.

Accordingly, the NLRB rejected the employer's appeal and upheld the election. (Endless Mold, Inc. and International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), National Labor Relations Board, April 19, 1974.)

NEGOTIATION NOTES

ARIZONA

State and Local Governments Barred from Entering into Collective Bargaining Agreements with Public Employees

The attorney general ruled that state and local governments may not enter into a collective bargaining agreement with public employee unions.

According to the attorney general, in the absence of provisions in the Arizona constitution or statutes granting the state or local governments the power to bargain collectively with public employees, the power to establish terms and conditions of employment for those employees resides with the state legislature.

Also, a local government which has adopted a merit system establishing terms and conditions of employment for its employees on the basis of authority delegated by the state legislature is barred from entering into a collective bargaining agreement with a union. In the absense of such a system, a local public employer may enter into an agreement to meet and discuss terms and conditions of employment with a union, provided the agreement does not grant the union exclusive recognition and does not preclude the negotiation of "side" agreements between the local government and individual employees.

CALIFORNIA

No Closed Door Meet-and-Confer Sessions

In an attempt to resolve an ambiguity in state law, the Attorney General created an anomalous situation which allows school boards to meet in executive session to discuss negotiation strategy. The situation results from Section 3505 of the Government Code which permits governing bodies to meet and confer with employees with or without a designated representative. However, Section 54953 of the Brown Act mandates open public hearings while another section, 54957.9, permits boards to discuss meet-and-confer strategy in executive session, upon electing to have a designated representative accompany the board in meet-and-confer sessions with its employees.

Mindful of the law and strong public policy against meetings of public bodies held in secret, the attorney general ruled that a board may not meet in executive session to discuss meet-and-confer strategy unless it has chosen a designated representative to assist it, but, the board that does not do so may also hold nonpublic hearings.

Despite the anomaly, the attorney general has made it possible for governing bodies to bypass the prohibition by the expedient of naming one or more board members as designated representatives.

KANSAS

Public Employees Labor Relations Act Amended

Two amendments to the Kansas Public Employees Labor Relations Act outline procedures for certification of business agents for employee organizations and mandate submission of annual reports. To be certified as a business agent, a person must file an application with the secretary of state and pay a registration fee of $1.00. He must be a U.S. citizen, must give his name, address, and length of residence in Kansas, and must submit along with the application a statement signed by the president and the secretary of the organization authorizing him to act in behalf of the organization.

Every employee organization with 100 or more members must file annual reports showing its financial condition. These reports must also include names and titles of officers and business agents along with their salaries, bonuses, and other remuneration, the date of elections for officers, amount charged for initiation fees, assessments, and other periodic payments, and an audited statement of the organization's income, expenditures, assets, and liabilities. However, the requirement for the annual report may be satisfied by submitting copies of the reports required to be filed with the U.S. Department of Labor in accordance with the federal labor management reporting and disclosure act of 1959.

MASSACHUSETTS

Some Teachers Eligible for Food Stamps

Many highly trained teachers with years of experience qualify for the federal government's food stamp program according to the Massachusetts Teachers Association (MTA). The Association noted that many of the teachers qualifying for food stamps are not just teachers who are at the low end of the pay scale, "some are seasoned teachers who have years of experience and hold advanced degrees."

Under the Food Stamp Program which is run by the U.S. Department of Agriculture in cooperation with the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and administered in Massachusetts through the state Department of Welfare, food stamps or coupons are sold to the unemployed, welfare recipients, and low-wage earners for less than their actual value to help them purchase food. How many stamps a family receives and the amount it pays for them are based on the size of the family and its adjusted income. For example, an eligible family of four receives $150 in stamps; a family with an adjusted net income of $420 per month would pay $118 for the $150 worth of stamps but another family with a lower adjusted income would pay less.

To determine a family's eligibility for stamps, the family's resources, which include money on hand or in the bank, stocks and bonds, money from insurance settlements, inheritances, prizes and awards, and lump-sum payments from Social Security, must not exceed $1,500. However, for persons age 60 or older maximum resources must not exceed $3,000. If the family meets this requirement, its adjusted income is determined by deducting federal and state income tax, Social Security or mandatory retirement, association dues, mandatory association costs, court ordered alimony or child support, medical and dental costs, health insurance costs over $10, and child care. Shelter, including rent or mortgage payments, real property insurance, electricity, water, heat, cooking costs, sewage disposal fees, and special assessments, may be deducted if they total more than 30 percent of income after deductions. Finally, the family size and adjusted income are used to determine if the family is eligible to participate in the stamp program.

The MTA pointed out that although it is impossible to say exactly how many teachers are participating in the stamp program, many more are probably eligible. The Association is urging teachers to apply if they qualify.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Interference with Peaceful Picketing a Violation of Teachers' Constitutional Rights

Teachers have a constitutional right to picket, ruled a federal court in New Hampshire. Specifically, the court ruled that striking teachers in Timberline, New Hampshire, are guaranteed the right of free speech and assembly by the federal Constitution even though they are no longer employed by the school district. School officials, who replaced the teachers with strikebreakers, contended that the teachers no longer had a contractual relationship with the district, and, therefore, their picketing was a parade, not a strike activity. Disagreeing with the district's contention, the court ruled that the teachers, who have been on strike since February 26, did not need a permit to picket either schools or school-sponsored events. The court then enjoined school officials from further interference with peaceful picketing.

NEW YORK

Nurse/Clerks Placed in Teacher Bargaining Unit

The New York Public Employment Relations Board ruled that two public-school nurse/clerks should be included in a professional rather than a nonprofessional bargaining unit.

The two nurses sought to align themselves with the Putnam Valley Federation of Teachers, the professional staff bargaining agent, instead of the Putnam Valley Chapter, Civil Service Employees Association. The two positions included the job category of nurse/teacher in the elementary school. One of the nurse/clerks whose duties were substantially the same as those of the school nurse with the exception of teaching, was hired for the middle school building. A part-time health education teacher was hired for both schools; this clearly established limitations on the role of the nurse/clerk as opposed to that of the nurse/teacher.

A PERB hearing officer ascertained that the employee was fully aware of her placement in the new position as nurse/clerk in the nonteaching unit; yet he affirmed that no evidence existed to indicate any preconditional employment arrangements with the Putnam Valley Chapter with regard to the nurse/clerk's status and salary. He found the duties of the nurse/clerk to include providing routine examinations and emergency care for students, operating a daily student health care program, serving as attendance officer, maintaining records, and participating in community health care programs.

The extensive duties of the nurse/clerks, in addition to the requirement of a license and the general professional scope of their work, coupled with the lack of evidence of potential conflict of interests between teachers and nurses, convinced PERB to grant the petition of the nurse/clerks and place them in the professional bargaining unit. (*Putnam Valley Central School District and Putnam Valley Federation of Teachers, Local 1857, NYSUT, NEA, AFT, AFL-CIO and Putnam Valley Chapter, Civil Service Employees Assn., Inc. NORTH DAKOTA

School District Employees Covered Under State Minimum Wage Law But Not State Employees

The state attorney general ruled that the State Minimum Wage Law (Century Code, Chapter 34-06) covered the employees of school districts and other political subdivisions of the state.

The language of the law does not specifically refer to public employees; however, the attorney general held that the broad definition of "employer" as "any person or group of persons acting in the interest of an employer in relation to an employee" meant that the law was applicable to public employers. Therefore in the absence of contrary provisions the employees of political subdivisions of the state, including school districts, are covered under the state minimum wage law even though state employees are excluded.

SOUTH DAKOTA

Public Employee Union Law Amended

As amended, Section 3-18-2 of the South Dakota laws regulating public employee unions now allows public employees to form and join labor or employee organizations, or to refrain from forming or joining such organizations. Public employees may designate representatives to meet and negotiate with a governmental agency or its designated representative regarding grievance procedures and conditions of employment. The amended version of the law prohibits discharge or discrimination against an employee for exercising these rights. Moreover, the law mandates that the governmental agency or designated representative meet and negotiate in good faith with the employees' representatives at reasonable times concerning grievance procedures and conditions of employment. However, the obligation to bargain does not require either party to agree to a proposal or to make concessions, but each party is required to formulate a statement of rationale for any position taken.

FEDERAL

Library Not Eligible To Pay Full-Time Students at Subminimum Wage Rates

Replying to an inquiry regarding payment of subminimum wages to employees of a public library, the Wage and Hour Administration of the U.S. Department of Labor ruled that full-time student employees of public libraries are covered under the Fair Labor Standards Act as amended in 1974 and, must be paid the minimum wage.

Only retail or service establishments or institutions of higher education who employ full- or part-time student employees during summer vacations may pay them less than minimum wages. Public libraries do not come under these categories because the work of a library is directed to the improvement of the cultural level of the community, a goal alien to the accepted understanding of a "retail" activity.

Therefore, a public library is not permitted to pay employees 85% of the minimum wage as established by section 14(b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act which allows payment of subminimum wages.

Increase in Pay Standards for White-Collar Workers Proposed

The Labor Department, Wage and Hour Division, has proposed to increase the pay standards for executive, administrative, and professional employees covered under the Fair Labor Standards Act. The standards are to be increased from $125 to $160 a week for executive and administrative employees and from $140 to $185 a week for professional employees. The increases are recommended because since March 1970 the Consumer Price Index has risen 27 points and the minimum wage standard has increased to $2.00 an hour.

An even higher standard of $200 to $300 a week is proposed for executive, administrative, and professional employees whose salaries exceed the normal $125 or $140. Additionally, the special salary standards for the motion picture industry and for white-collar workers in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and American Samoa would also be raised.

STATISTICS

MULTIPLE JOBHOLDING, MAY 1973

According to recent data published by the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, the number of workers holding two or more jobs reached an all-time high in May 1973—4.3 million, or 5 percent of all employed persons.

From May 1972 to May 1973, the number of workers having more than one job, particularly those who were engaged in durable goods, manufacturing, construction, and public administration, increased 500,000.

While the percentage of multiple job holders who were women increased from 14 percent in 1962 to 20 percent in 1973, the increase is attributable in part to the more rapidly increasing number of women than men in the labor force. The majority of moonlighters in May 1973, however, were men. The greatest incidence of multiple job holding, 9.26 percent, was among married men aged 35 to 44. In recent years, the rate of moonlighting among black men workers has been lower than that of white men, but in 1973, the rate for black men rose significantly to 6.0, compared with 6.7 for white men. The rate among black women workers was 3.0 percent; among white women, 2.7 percent.

In terms of occupation and industry, it is noteworthy that 19.2 percent of the teachers below college level held two or more jobs. Policemen and firemen at 14.2 percent ranked second highest. In contrast, self-employed men in nonagricultural jobs had one of the lowest rates. Generally, moonlighters did not engage in the same type of work on their second jobs as on their first jobs. Professionals, however, were an exception, the majority being employed as professionals on the second job as well as on the first. The majority (three-fourths) of men multiple job holders held a full-time job and a part-time job, but about half of the women moonlighters had two part-time jobs and 45 percent had a full-time job and a part-time job. On the average, men worked 14 hours a week at their second jobs, and women worked 11 hours.

Table 1 shows the number of hours worked at the primary job for persons at work at two or more jobs by occupation group of primary job in May 1973. For the total group 39 percent worked 40 hours a week; 42.2 percent of teachers below the college level worked 40 hours.

WHITE-COLLAR PAY INCREASED BY 6.4 PERCENT

A 6.4 percent increase in average annual salaries for selected white-collar occupations in private industry was revealed in a survey conducted by the U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, for the year ending March 1974. (Average teacher salaries paid in 1973-74 increased 5.0 percent) At the same time, the Consumer Price Index rose 10.2 percent.

Data from the beginning of the series in 1961 show a trend toward larger percentage increases in salaries, reaching a peak in 1970 to 1971, declining from 1971 to 1973, and rising again from 1973 to 1974.

The largest percentage increase from 1973 to 1974, 6.5, was recorded for the clerical group, and the lowest, 5.0, for the entry and developmental professional and administrative group. Average annual first or entry level salaries of selected occupational groups were as follows: engineers, $11,901; buyers, $10,073; job analysts, $9,783; and chemists, $10,660. The average scheduled minimum salary for beginning teachers with bachelor's degrees in 1973-74 in school systems enrolling 6,000 or more pupils was $7,720. The average annual salaries of two groups—chief accountants I, averaging $15,790 may be compared with the average scheduled maximum salary for teachers with master's degrees, $13,303.

SPECIAL REPORTS

MATERNITY LEAVE PROVISIONS IN TEACHER AGREEMENTS

Are teacher associations and school boards negotiating maternity leave provisions that are in compliance with Equal Employment Opportunity Commission Guidelines which represent the official interpretation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Code of 1964 and recent court decisions? A random sample of 1973-74 contracts on file at the NEA incorporating a maternity leave provision was surveyed to see what is being negotiated since issuance of the Guidelines.

According to the revised "Guidelines on Discrimination Because of Sex" issued by EEOC, employment policies which exclude applicants or employees from employment because of pregnancy are in violation of Title VII; and pregnancy and any disability deriving from pregnancy, including recovery from childbirth, miscarriage, or abortion, should be treated like any other temporary disability under any health or temporary disability insurance or sick leave plan available in connection with employment.[1] Additionally, the federal courts have ruled that maternity leave provisions which require that teachers terminate employment at a given point of pregnancy and remain on leave for a given length of time, regardless of the individual's physical condition, violates the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution.

None of the 50 contracts analyzed denied a tenured teacher maternity leave. However, 24 percent (12) of the contracts did not grant such leave to nontenured teachers and/or teachers with less than a specified length of service with the school district. Use of sick leave during absence was permitted by 34 percent (17) of the contracts analyzed, but 30 percent (15) denied use of sick leave for this purpose. Five of the provisions permitting use of sick leave for maternity leave covered only the period of actual disability or incapacitation while four (8 percent) allowed the individual to use such leave until it was exhausted.

[1] The Supreme Court in Geduldig v. Aiello, et al. ruled that California's refusal to pay disability benefits for normal pregnancy disabilities was not a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution. Payment of benefits for disability accompanying normal pregnancy and delivery would require California to change or compromise its policy with regard to the amount employees pay into the program, maximum benefits allowable, and other variables affecting the solvency of the program. And, according to the court, the Equal Protection Clause does not require a state to change its insurance program in order to make it more comprehensive.

Three provisions required pregnant teachers to stop work a certain length of time before expected delivery without regard to the individual's physical condition. In the Matter of Jo Carol La Fleur vs. Cleveland Board of Education, the Supreme Court of the United States overturned the board's maternity leave policy which forced pregnant teachers to take unpaid leave after the fourth month of pregnancy and to continue in such status until the beginning of the first school term after the baby was three months old, and upheld the decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit that need for such an extended period of leave required by the board was "arbitrary and unreasonable" and not supported by medical evidence.

Language more in line with the intent of the Guidelines was found in (32 percent) (16) of the provisions which allowed teachers to continue working provided they could carry out their contractual responsibilities and had obtained medical permission to do so. The U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in Schattmen vs. Texas Employment Commission upheld the right of a woman upon the advice of her physician to decide when she should terminate employment. The majority of the provisions, 62 percent, (31), neither required the teacher to stop work at a certain point nor to have a physician's permission to continue working.

Women teachers are required to remain on leave for a certain period of time following birth of a child by 8 percent (4) of the provisions. A doctor's certificate of good health is required in 22 percent (11) of the provisions before the teacher may return to duty. Some school districts, 14 percent, require 30 or more days' notification prior to return to duty. Such lengthy notification could be viewed as a means of mandating that teachers remain on leave for a specified time. Additionally, clauses that allow teachers to return to duty only at a given point during the school year, such as the beginning of a semester or a school year, may cause a teacher to extend her leave longer than she wishes; on the other hand, such a provision prevents disruption of the educational program.

Twelve percent (6) of the provisions analyzed provide for maintenance of benefits while on leave. Of those six, the teacher must pay the total cost of such benefits in five and the teacher and board share the costs in one.

Four percent (2) of the agreements contained a clause stating that the maternity leave provision will be changed if found to be in violation of any legislative action. State boards of education in Connecticut and Hawaii revised their minimum employment standards for pregnant teachers to comply with the EEOC Guidelines by providing that pregnancy and pregnancy-related disabilities are to be treated as temporary disabilities covered by sick leave benefits.

Following are sample provisions from negotiated contracts and a proposed Parental Leave of Absence Policy issued by the NEA Office of General Counsel to assist local teacher associations in modifying their present policies and negotiated maternity leave provisions.

PROPOSED PARENTAL LEAVE OF ABSENCE POLICY

A parental leave of absence without pay shall be granted to a teacher for the purpose of childbearing and/or child rearing as follows:

(1) A teacher who is pregnant shall be entitled upon request to a leave to begin at any time between the commencement of her pregnancy and one (1) year after a child is born to her. Said teacher shall notify the superintendent in writing at least thirty (30) days prior to the date on which she desires to begin her leave and shall include with such notice either a physician's statement certifying her pregnancy or a copy of the birth certificate of her child, whichever is applicable. A teacher who is pregnant may continue in active employment as late into her pregnancy as she desires provided she is able to properly perform her required functions, except that a teacher who will have completed the seventh month of her pregnancy on the date scheduled for the commencement of a new school year may be placed on involuntary leave effective as of the beginning of said school year. If a teacher's leave is taken for the express purpose of childbirth or other termination of pregnancy and the total amount of leave does not exceed thirty (30) days, the teacher may at her option have all or any part of said leave charged to her annual or accumulated sick leave.

(2) A male teacher shall be entitled upon request to a leave to begin at any time between the birth of a child to his wife or whom he has fathered and one (1) year thereafter.

(3) A teacher adopting an infant child (i.e., one (1) year of age or less) shall be entitled upon request to a leave to commence at any time during the first year after receiving de facto custody of said infant child, or prior to receiving such custody if necessary in order to fulfill the requirements for adoption.

A teacher who is granted a parental leave of absence pursuant to Section A above shall have the following reemployment rights:

(1) If a teacher notifies the superintendent of his or her desire to resume active employment within sixty (60) days after the termination of pregnancy for any reason, the acquisition of de facto custody of an infant child, the birth of a child to the wife of or fathered by a male teacher, or the commencement of the leave, whichever is later, said teacher shall within fourteen (14) days after receipt of the notice be assigned to the same position which she or he held at the time the leave commenced, or if that position is no longer in existence, to a substantially equivalent position, except that if a teacher gives such notice after April 30, she or he may be placed on involuntary leave until the commencement of the next school year. Said teacher shall be considered as if she or he were actively employed by the school district during the period of the leave and shall be placed on the salary schedule at the level that would have been achieved if no leave had been taken, provided that the period of the leave shall not count toward the fulfillment of the time requirements for acquiring tenure.

(2) If a teacher notifies the superintendent of her or his desire to resume active employment after the expiration of the aforesaid sixty (60) day period but within forty-eight (48) months after the commencement of the leave, said teacher shall be assigned to the first available vacant position for which she or he is qualified, provided that if more than one (1) teacher has given notice pursuant to this paragraph, the teacher who gave such notice at the earliest date shall be assigned to the position in question. Said teacher shall not receive credit on the salary schedule for the period of the leave.

(3) A teacher who resumes active employment pursuant to paragraph (1) or (2) above, shall have restored all benefits to which she or he was entitled at the time the leave commenced, including without limitation unused accumulated sick leave and credits toward sabbatical eligibility. While on leave, a teacher shall have the option to remain an active participant in the state teacher retirement system and/or other fringe benefit programs by contributing thereto the amount she or he would have been required to contribute if actively employed and the school district shall contribute the amount that it would have been required to contribute if the teacher were actively employed.

A teacher on parental leave of absence shall not be denied the opportunity to substitute in the school district by reason of the fact that she or he is on such leave of absence.

MATERNITY AND ADOPTION LEAVE

A teacher who is pregnant should notify her principal immediately in order for her to become aware of the options available. Planning can then be done in the best interest of both the teacher and the students.

The teacher must present a physician's statement attesting to her pregnancy and the anticipated date of birth. Two calendar months prior to the anticipated date she must choose one of the following options:

Option 1—Request leave for one school year, for the remainder of the school year, or for three and one-half calendar months. (Two months prior and one and one-half months after anticipated date. One-half calendar month shall be considered to be fifteen days.) A temporary teacher will be appointed for the length of the leave.

Option 2—Present physician's statement declaring it will not be harmful for teacher to work and declare intentions to use sick leave during her absence. A substitute teacher will be used during the teacher's absence.

A teacher who chooses Option 2 may change to Option 1 at any time, but within one and one-half calendar months after the birth, she must change to Option 1 or declare her intentions to return to work.

Option 1 may be used for the adoption of a child.

Return to Position After Extended Leave

A teacher granted an extended leave of absence during a school term may not expect reassignment until the beginning of the next school year. The teacher must file a Request for Leave with the Personnel Office and notify his principal by April 15th.

MATERNITY LEAVE

When a married woman teacher shall become pregnant, and desires to return to the employ of the Board at a future date she must make written application to the Assistant Superintendent, Teacher Personnel for a leave of absence without pay. Such application must be accompanied by a doctor's written statement, stating the approximate date of delivery. Verification by the School Physician of the diagnosis may be required. This leave of absence may become effective at any time during pregnancy, and must become effective no later than the last expected date prior to delivery on which the teacher will be physically and emotionally capable of performing all the duties and functions of her position, with said date to be established by a doctor's written statement. To request the termination of a maternity leave, the teacher must submit to the Superintendent of Schools a written statement from her doctor certifying that she is both physically and emotionally ready to resume her duties in the schools. The Superintendent of Schools may require verification of the statement by the School Physician. Reinstatement on the rolls shall occur no later than thirty (30) days following the doctor's certification and the teacher's notification that she is ready for assignment.

In the event of legislative action which would affect these maternity leave provisions, or in the event of decisive court action to that effect, the parties agree to reopen negotiations under the Interim Negotiations provision of the Procedures for Professional Negotiations on the affected maternity leave provisions only. In the event of a court decision affecting the maternity leave provisions from which a party at interest shall appeal, the parties to this Agreement shall reopen negotiations as provided above and the Board shall otherwise proceed in the implementation of the court's decision unless a stay of execution is obtained.

The maximum amount of leave granted for a maternity case shall be the remainder of the semester in which the leave becomes effective and one school year. When the employee elects to use the maximum amount of maternity leave provided, she shall inform the Superintendent of Schools, in writing, of her intention to return to service at least 120 days before she expects to resume her duties. Failure to comply with this regulation shall be deemed an automatic resignation.

ABSENCE REQUIRED BY PREGNANCY AND MATERNITY LEAVE

Pregnancy will be treated as any other temporary medical disability in accordance with the Federal Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended, and Subchapter II, Chapter III, Wisconsin Statutes. Thus a teacher may, with her doctor's consent, teach as long as she is physically and emotionally capable of performing her professional duties. A teacher is expected to return to her professional duties when medically capable of returning unless a leave has been granted pursuant to the following paragraphs. However, it is not the intent of this section to provide benefits different from or in excess of valid guidelines or regulations established pursuant to said laws except for teachers who have been employed by the Madison Board of Education in excess of three years.

The teacher shall notify the principal immediately when pregnancy has been established and she shall present a statement from a physician as to the anticipated date of birth.

At least three years of continuous employment in the Madison Public Schools immediately prior to a request for maternity leave is a prerequisite for approval of the leave.

A request for a maternity leave of absence is made in writing to the Director of Personnel for approval; a disapproved request may be appealed to the Superintendent of Schools and the Board of Education.

Evaluators shall be trained in the techniques and criteria to be used in the evaluation process. The performance of all teachers shall be evaluated in writing. Teachers on limited contracts shall be evaluated in each year of their employment. Teachers on continuing contracts shall be evaluated at least once every four (4) years. All teachers shall be evaluated according to procedures contained herein.

The teacher and evaluator shall confer within a few weeks following the teacher's commencement of service in any year the teacher is to be evaluated in order to set forth goals and objectives to help the individual needs of children. Notes are made of the goals agreed upon and the ways of fulfilling objectives. The teacher and the evaluator shall each receive a copy of the agreed to goals and objectives.

Before the end of the teacher's initial quarter of employment for that year of service, the teacher and evaluator shall confer and review the notes from the first conference. Original objectives and goals are discussed and evaluated with changes made if needed. Again notes are recorded and agreed to with each party receiving a copy of the notes.

By April 15th the teacher and evaluator shall confer in an attempt to reach agreement on the fulfillment of the goals and objectives. The Teacher-Evaluator Conference form (Appendix C) shall be completed, and the teacher is to read and sign the evaluation form, and shall receive a copy. Such signature indicates that the teacher has read and is aware of the contents. If the teacher disagrees with the evaluation he or she may submit a written reply within ten (10) days to the Principal, who will forward the written reply to the Director of Administrative Problems for Certified Personnel who will attach it to the file copy. The Division of Personnel will acknowledge the receipt of such reply by written notification to the teacher and principal.

In addition to the formal assessment and evaluation which results in a written report, any teacher may be observed as the Principal deems advisable for the purpose of improvement of instruction. Teachers are encouraged to make use of video-tape recorders where available, for the purpose of self-evaluation. These video-tapes may be reviewed by the Department Chairman, Principal and other appropriate Instructional Personnel.

Administrative staff members are encouraged to write and have filed in the teacher's personnel file letters of appraisal and commendation.

The Principal will be expected to submit to the Director of Administrative Problems for Certified Personnel and to the teacher the final written evaluation and recommendation concerning each year being evaluated prior to May 1st of each year.

Evaluations other than those mentioned in the Section A are encouraged at any time deemed advisable by either the teacher or the evaluator.

A copy of the teacher's job description is incorporated by reference in Appendix.

A transfer may be requested by the teacher, by the principal of the teacher's school, or by the superintendent, but it will not be considered if the teacher does not qualify for an existing vacancy; a teacher's application is effective for one year only and if not granted must be reapplied for the following year.

INVOLUNTARY TRANSFERS

An involuntary transfer will be made by the Superintendent to prevent undue disruption of the instructional program, to relieve overstaffing and other unforeseen circumstances which may occur. To the extent practicable, the procedure for selection of surplus teachers to be transferred will be followed.

Procedures For Selecting Surplus Teachers

Surplus is a situation which exists when there are more teachers under contract and assigned to a school than are needed at that school.

The first step in selecting the surplus teacher(s) for transfer will be for the Principal to assess the composition of the school and the needs of the school.

- The Principal will seek a volunteer.
- If there are no volunteers then the teacher with the shortest period of service in the System will be considered the surplus teacher.
- A teacher should not be transferred two consecutive years unless such transfer is necessary to permit the teacher to be retained in the System.
- A teacher should not be transferred in the year immediately preceding attainment of continuing contract status.

Prior to the end of the quarter, or as soon as possible thereafter, the transferee will be altered to a possible transfer and to the probable assignment. If at all possible, the transferee should be notified of his or her tentative schedule.

The teacher chosen for transfer shall have the right to appeal to the Associate Superintendent for Personnel within five (5) days after receiving notification of the transfer.

Any sections contained herein under this Article shall not be applicable if in conflict with any court ordered transfer plans should such orders be instituted during the life of this Agreement. Preference for assignment for the summer quarter and adult education positions will be given to staff members who apply; the associate superintendent for personnel will publish a list of vacancies for the ensuing year in March, April, and May; first choice will be given to teachers transferred involuntarily; vacancies will be posted in each school in advance where possible, preference will be given to qualified teachers already employed by the board, but additional applicants will be encouraged to apply; teachers are responsible for control of students under their supervision or observation; if a particular pupil requires specific attention, the board will take reasonable steps to assist the teacher and the pupil. Teachers may take such action as necessary to protect themselves from attack or to prevent injury to students. Procedures for handling disruptive students will be developed in each school, put in writing, and presented to each teacher; if a teacher is assaulted while on duty, either on or off school property, the board will provide legal advice through its counsel.

ILLINOIS

Teachers Who Refuse To Sign New Contract Entitled to Payment Under Old Agreement

Determining the Aurora School District Board's policy to be neither arbitrary, capricious, nor unreasonable, an appellate court justified payment under the provisions of the previous contract to two teachers who refused to sign a new contract.

Threatened with a strike by the Aurora Education Association East if no satisfactory contract were produced for the coming term, the district responded with a new agreement containing salary and benefits increases and a proposal for the recalcitrant teachers to accept the new contract or the same salary terms and benefits as in the previous year.

Two teachers contended that the board had no legal base to arbitrarily demand that a tenured teacher sign a contract containing other obligations in addition to a salary offer, arguing that they were entitled to the same salary as the other teachers in the district. The appellate court, however, by virtue of Donahoo v. Board of Education, determined that a board could negotiate contracts with tenured teachers. Additionally, in accordance with Allen v. Mauer, which permitted "unsigned" teachers to be compensated under previous contract provisions while "signed" teachers could be remunerated under the new contract, the court ruled that the teachers were ineligible for the salary increase under the new arrangement because they could not expect to benefit from a contract they did not sign.

Concluding that the alternative chosen by the teachers contained a reinforcement of the law allowing tenured teachers who had not signed a contract to return to their assignments under the old salary terms, the court reaffirmed its decision. (Robert F. Davis and Jerry Lubshina v. Aurora, Ill., Board of Education, Illinois Appellate Court, June 5, 1974.)

MASSACHUSETTS

Municipal Finance Law Does Not Bar Three-Year Salary Agreements

According to the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, the Massachusetts Municipal Finance law cannot be interpreted to mean that approved salary increases must take effect within three months of enactment, and, therefore, municipalities in which wage scales are established by ordinance are not barred from negotiating binding increases effective in the second and third year of a contract period. This provision of the municipal finance law conflicts with the state collective bargaining act which mandates implementation of salary increases in the second and third year of a contract. To use the provision of the municipal finance law as a bar to a negotiated increase constitutes failure to bargain in good faith, and, therefore, the Supreme Judicial Court ordered the town of Taunton to pay salary increases provided under a three-year contract.

In January 1972, the newly elected mayor refused to request the Council to appropriate the funds for the 1972 increases, claiming that the contract violated the state municipal finance law. The Taunton police filed a complaint with the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission. The Commission ruled that the mayor's action violated the contract and the state collective bargaining law and was, therefore, a failure to bargain in good faith.

Both a trial court and an appeals court upheld the mayor's position, and ruled that the municipal finance law required that both ordinances approving budget increases and the increases themselves must take effect within three months, thus barring the negotiated increases.

On appeal, the state supreme court overruled the lower courts' interpretation, and held that the municipal finance law should not be interpreted to require increases to take effect within three months, and thus reconciled the municipal finance law with the state collective bargaining law which allows municipal employees to sign three-year bargaining contracts. The supreme court also indicated that it approved the decision of the MLRC that under a validly negotiated and executed agreement "emphasis should be placed on the obligation of the parties to a municipal collective bargaining contract to implement its provisions and . . .the mayor's refusal to honor this obligation properly could be found to constitute a prohibited practice." (Mendes et. al. v. City of Taunton, et al.; Massachusetts Judicial Supreme Court, August 2, 1974.)

NEW YORK

Employer's Restriction on Instructors' Earning Power Violates Collective Bargaining Agreement

Restriction on the number of hours daytime faculty members can teach in the night school division is a matter for an arbitrator to decide under the collective bargaining agreement, according to a decision of the New York State Supreme Court in a case bought by the Hudson Valley Community College Faculty Association against Hudson Valley Community College.

The college had formulated new regulations which placed limitations on the potential earning power of the Association members by restricting the number of hours day faculty could teach in the night division. Teachers in the night division were not included in the bargaining unit. The HVCCFA argued that the determination of the arbitrability of the grievance was properly the subject for an arbitrator to decide, that the subject of the grievance was not excluded from the collective bargaining agreement, and that the result was contrary to public policy. The college held that the teaching assignments in the night division were not under the scope of the agreement and, therefore, not arbitrable.

The court held that a limitation on the earning power of the Association members when no such prearrangements existed, constituted an infraction of the bargaining agreement. The court reasoned that to deny arbitration on the ground that the night division faculty were not parties to the agreement and, therefore, not entitled to utilize the grievance procedure, was irrelevant since faculty members who were protected by the contract had rights respecting instruction in the night division.

Attacking the college's contention that submission of the case to arbitration would abrogate their managerial rights, protected by the contract, the court declared that the argument lacked merit because it opposed the very nature of arbitration.

Concluding that the Association's resort to arbitration was appropriate, the court dismissed the case. (Hudson Valley Community College Faculty Association v. Hudson Valley Community College, New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, March 21, 1974.)

PERB Erred in Ordering Board To Pay Merit Increments

The New York State Supreme Court, Appellate Division, while upholding a PERB ruling that the refusal of the Jefferson County Board of Supervisors to grant merit increments to the college faculty members violated the Taylor Law's duty to bargain in good faith, rejected the Board's right to order payment of the increments.

A contractual arrangement between the Faculty Association of Jefferson Community College and the Jefferson County Board of Supervisors had established that all increments be based on merit, determinable by the Board of Trustees which had customarily granted increments to all continuing faculty members. When the Board of Trustees submitted its budget for the increments, the Board of Supervisors, instead of providing the funds, asked for an explanation of its method of granting increments. Having received no reply, the Board of Supervisors entered into a more satisfactory agreement with other county employees and submitted to the Board of Trustees only half of the budget requested.

Filing a complaint with PERB, the Association charged that the Board of Supervisors interfered with their contract rights and failed to negotiate in good faith. Thereupon PERB ordered the Board of Supervisors to cease and desist from refusing to pay the recommended increments.

Seeking an annulment of the PERB determination, the Board of Supervisors maintained that PERB had no authority to order them to pay the merit increments.

Finding that there was sufficient evidence to support PERB's determination that the Board of Supervisors attempted unilaterally to alter its contract with the Association, the Court modified the PERB award to an order directing the Board of Supervisors to negotiate in good faith, and since the Civil Service Law does not empower the PERB to impose a remedy, ordered the payment of the merit increment deleted from the award. (Jefferson County Board of Supervisors v. New York State Public Employment Relations Board, the Faculty Association of Jefferson Community College, and the Board of Trustees of Jefferson Community College, N.Y.S. Supreme Court May 23, 1974.)

Teachers' Strike Penalty Justified and Timeliness of Back Pay Grievance Clarified

Clarification concerning strike penalty and the procedure for claiming back pay through the grievance process were established in two separate proceedings by the appellate division of the New York State Supreme Court.

- In a case brought by the Yonkers Federation of Teachers against the state Public Employment Relations Board, the Court upheld a PERB decision which revoked the dues checkoff privileges owing to the Federation's violation of the Civil Service Law which prohibits strikes by public employees.

The Yonkers Board of Education had filed a charge with PERB that the Yonkers Federation of Teachers had violated the Civil Service Law by striking. The Federation held that the board had provoked the strike by engaging in "acts of extreme provocation."

A PERB hearing officer sustained the board's charge and held that the strike was called because the Federation failed to achieve its bargaining demands during a self-imposed time period. The full PERB then instructed the board to suspend the Federation's dues deduction privileges.

The State Supreme Court found that the union had resorted to the strike as a bargaining weapon after threatening a walkout. Although recognizing that the board's behavior was not commendable, the Court found no justification in the Federation's claim that the school district was guilty of "acts of extreme provocation" and upheld PERB's decision to suspend the union's dues checkoff privileges. (Yonkers Federation of Teachers, AFT Local 860, AFL-CIO v. PERB, New York State Supreme Court, Appellate Division, June 25, 1974.)

- The case between the Guilderland Central Teachers Association and the Guilderland Central School District involved the timeliness of filing a demand for veterans' military service pay. The board contended that it was not obligated to grant back pay since the grievance had not been filed within the 20-day time limit established by Section 3813 of the Education Law. The appellate court ruled that both parties had the option to dispense with the application of Section 3813, designed as a protective measure against unnecessary delays which would impede the validity of an investigation.

Because the Guilderland contract did not require compliance with the clause in question, the court determined that adherence to the 20-day limit was not a prerequisite for arbitration. (Guilderland Central School District and Guilderland Central Teachers Association, New York State Supreme Court, Appellate Court, Appellate Division, June 13, 1974.)

RHODE ISLAND

City Held In Contempt of Court for Failure To Fulfill Contract

In a seemingly never ending legal battle, the Providence Teachers Union sought and won a contempt citation against the city and school committee of Providence for failure to live up to their contractual obligation to pay more than $350,000 in severance pay to 55 retired teachers.

Under a severance pay clause, negotiated in 1968, retiring teachers with 35 years of service were to receive credit for 90 full days and 200 half days maximum less any used sick leave. During the negotiations the city neglected to cost out this clause and upon implementation the city balked, claiming inability to pay.

Several arbitration and court decisions have struck down numerous city arguments among which were the inability to pay and a questioning of the validity of the contract relative to ratification by the city comptroller. In each instance the union was upheld.

Under state law, any municipality that claims inability to pay may be ordered to enact a general assessment of all revenue properties in order to meet its financial obligation. However, rather than seeking this long avenue to force payment the union obtained a contempt citation to force the city to pay. (Providence Teachers Union v. David R. McGovern, Rhode Island Supreme Court, May 13, 1974; Providence Teachers Union v. School Committee of the City of Providence, May 13, 1974.)

WASHINGTON

Inquiry into Sincerity of Religious Beliefs Not Prohibited

While the truth of a religious belief is not open to question, neither the Constitution of the United States nor the Constitution of the state of Washington prohibits "an inquiry into whether a religious belief is truly or sincerely held." Therefore, a Washington State trial court held that a quasi-judicial appeals board had the power to determine the religious sincerity of city employees in order to settle a dispute arising under the union shop provision of the collective bargaining agreement between the Municipality of Metropolitan Seattle and Local 674, Public Service Employees Union. However, because the dispute involved a fundamental right of the employees, the court held that it had power of judicial review and issued the following guidelines to the Board: If the Board finds that all or any of the employees, either truly holds a religious belief which teaches nonassociation with a union or is a member of a church or religious body which teaches nonassociation, the employees "may continue to make payments to the charities which each has selected" instead of paying dues and initiation fees to the union. Such a settlement could not be challenged as a violation of equal protection of the laws since such discrimination is permitted by the First Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

State law provides that a public employee who is a member of a church or religious body whose teachings or tenets require nonassociation with a union and is employed under a union shop agreement shall pay an amount of money equivalent to regular union dues and initiation fees to a nonreligious charity or to another charitable organization agreed upon by the employee and his bargaining representative.

Acting under this law, several employees had forwarded checks covering initiation fees and the first month's dues to the union with the stipulation that the checks be turned over to a charity. The union requested the employees to inform it of the nature of their religious objections, and said that it would no longer accept their payments until it was satisfied that their objections were bona fide and threatened to request their termination unless the information was supplied.

Acting under the terms of the collective bargaining agreement providing for binding arbitration of disputes arising under it, the city brought the matter directly to an appeals board and asked it to determine if the employees' religious objections were genuine.

The employees contended that the board lacked jurisdiction on the following grounds: (a) By forwarding their checks, the union had waived its right to object to their payments to charity. (b) The preliminary steps of the grievance procedure had not been followed. (c) The inquiry was unnecessary because the law permitted the employees to choose whom they would pay. (d) The inquiry was prohibited as a violation of religious freedom under the First Amendment of the federal Constitution and the Constitution of the State of Washington.

The board denied these contentions and asserted its jurisdiction. The employees appealed to a state trial court to issue a writ of prohibition against the inquiry. The union contended that the court lacked jurisdiction to hear the challenge after the board had decided the question.

The court ruled that the arbitration statute implied that "a court has some authority in connection with arbitration of labor disputes to either enforce or revoke any agreement" and "in context with constitutional and statutory provisions" granting the court powers to issue writs of prohibition, "it is evident that where fundamental rights of a party are involved, the Superior Court has constitutional and statutory power of judicial review."

The court then dismissed the employees' contentions that the appeals board lacked jurisdiction. The court held that the question of the union's waiver of its rights has no bearing on the jurisdiction of the board, and that the preliminary steps of the grievance procedure were not applicable to this dispute because the job classification of the employees required that any action to terminate them would have to be taken by a majority vote of the governing body of the municipality. Under statute, the inquiry was necessary because the employees' right to select where payments go would arise only "if the employee holds a bona-fide religious belief or is a member of a church or religious body which teaches nonassociation." The court determined that while the truth of a religious doctrine or belief may not be questioned, neither the First Amendment to the federal Constitution nor the Constitution of the State of Washington "prohibit an inquiry into whether a religious belief is truly and sincerely held." (Adams, et al. v. Public Service Employees Union and Grant, Superior Court of the State of Washington for King County, June 20, 1974.)

FEDERAL

Indiana Education Employment Relations Board Has Jurisdiction over Case Involving Unfair Labor Practice, Decided on Other Ground Before the Board Existed

According to the U.S. Court of Appeals, 7th Circuit, the Indiana Education Employment Relations Board should have initial jurisdiction over charges that Michigan City's granting of exclusive use of internal communications facilities to the Michigan City Education Association as exclusive bargaining representative was an unfair labor practice under Indiana's collective bargaining statute and violated the rights of the Michigan City Federation of Teachers under the federal Constitution, even though the suit as orginally argued and decided by a lower federal court did not involve unfair labor practice charges, since neither the statute nor the board existed at that time. Therefore, the Court vacated a lower federal court's judgment in favor of the Federation and remanded the case to the Board.

Under the collective bargaining agreement signed in August 1972, the city had granted the Association, as exclusive bargaining agent for teachers, the exclusive right to use internal channels of communications such as school mailboxes, equipment, and buildings. The Federation filed a suit requesting a federal district court to prohibit the enforcement of exclusivity on the grounds that the denial of access to internal channels of communications violated its right under the 1st and 14th Amendments to the federal Constitution. The Association contended that since labor law was the source of its privileges as sole bargaining agent, constitutional law was not controlling.

Ruling on behalf of the Federation, the district court held that constitutional law was controlling and that the grant of exclusive privileges affected the ability of the Federation to communicate with its own members and all other teachers. Therefore, the injunction was granted.

The Association filed an appeal with the U.S. Court of Appeals, 7th Circuit, requesting the court to determine whether labor law or constitutional law was controlling, and if constitutional law was controlling, did the state have sufficient interest to warrant the granting of exclusive privileges.

However, after the appeal was filed and before it was adjudicated, Indiana enacted a statute which authorized school boards to engage in collective bargaining with teachers and created an Indiana Education Employment Relations Board with jurisdiction to determine unfair labor practices charges. Therefore, the Federation, in reply to the Association, asserted that the granting of exclusive privileges was an unfair labor practice under the new Indiana statute.

The court held that since the Federation had alleged that the granting of exclusive privileges to the Association was an unfair labor practice under the new statute, jurisdiction in the first instance properly belonged to the Indiana Education Employment Relations Board, and that the Federation had to exhaust all available state remedies before invoking federal jurisdiction. (Michigan City Federation of Teachers, Local No. 399 v. Michigan City Area Schools, and Michigan City Education Association, U.S. Court of Appeals 7th Circuit, April 16th, 1974.)

BOARD FINDINGS AND RULINGS

HAWAII

Exclusive Representative Entitled to Service Fee Despite Lack of Contract

The absence of a contract between the Hawaii Federation of College Teachers and the University of Hawaii does not the foreclose the exclusive representative from entitlement to service fees according to the Hawaii Public Employment Relations Board.

The issue of representation and the legality of HFCT's right to service fees when no contract was in force was challenged by the Federation's rival, the University of Hawaii Professional Assembly (UHPA) precipitating a review of the situation by HPERB.

Advancing a strict interpretation of the statute governing service fees, UHPA argued that only costs for negotiating and administering an agreement can warrant service fees, and since no bargaining agreement was in effect, a minimal fee should be imposed and any excess fees should be refunded to employees.

According to the board, the statutory purpose of promoting effective bargaining efforts by chosen representatives could not be achieved by a narrow interpretation of the service fee provision. For that reason the board deemed it necessary to adopt a construction which would be a modified agency shop, not only to eliminate the "free rider," but to insure the exclusive representative of financial stability so that it might perform all its responsibilities.

The Board determined the analysis above to be valid, and in another refutation of UPHA's strict and literal interpretation of the service fee provisions in the law, cited a state supreme court decision, Thomas v. Norton, which held that statutes must be interpreted according to their intent and meaning, that is, every part must be viewed in connection with the whole. The fundamental rationale of the Board was crystallized in its statement that the right to a service fee is not discretionary, but statutorily mandated and extending to any exclusive representative, not only those who have negotiated an agreement and have an agreement to administer. Consequently, the Board deemed the HFTA still entitled to the service fee since there was no provision for terminating the service fee before an exclusive employee representative ceased to be so.

Stressing that an exclusive representative, not only provides negotiation and contract administration, but also has the right to act for said employees, the Board asserted that since the exclusive representative has the duty to represent the interests of all such employees, it has the right to a service fee deduction as long as the employee organization remains certified as its exclusive representative. In view of this, the Board said that the right to a service fee deduction was not merely coincidental, but consequential.

UHPA proposed that if payment of the established service fee prevailed, it should be reduced. The Board held that since the primary purpose of the service fee was to pay for services rendered in the employees' behalf, and as such was a form of union security, it further protected the exclusive representative against competing unions by making it financially stable and free to carry out its responsibilities without resorting to the problem of raising revenues before fulfilling its responsibilities. Thus, the Board refrained from interfering with the decision made by the majority of members in the unit to have HFTA as their exclusive representative.

Turning its attention to UHPA's contention that HFCT had failed to meet its burden of showing cause why it should be allowed a service fee of any specific amount, the Board reiterated its statement concerning service fees wherein it stated that any review of service fees would be "based upon a history of actual costs and expenditures incurred by the petitioner during said interim period."

A thorough examination of HFTA's accounts revealed no serious discrepancies but a dependence upon the service fee deducted. In the absence of conflicting contractual provisions and in the absence of a contract the rules and regulations of the employer remain applicable, and, therefore, HFTA must expand funds and efforts to insure enforcement of them.

Concluding, the Board found on the basis of the record that costs incurred by HFTA benefited all employees in the unit and would continue to do so. The service fee deemed reasonable, the public employer was ordered to resume such deductions for HFTA until the Board directed otherwise. MICHIGAN

Confiscation of Newspapers Containing Election Endorsement Declared Unconstitutional

The removal of a teachers association newspaper from school mailboxes because it contained an endorsement of school-board candidates violated the contractual rights of the Association, the teachers' rights to free speech under the federal Constitution, and the state employment relations act. Therefore, an arbitrator sustained a charge of unfair labor practice in a grievance filed by the Wayne-Westland Education Association against the Board of Education, Wayne-Westland Community Schools.

During a school-board election, the Association, operating under an agreement granting it use of school mailboxes for communicating with its members (while prohibiting political activity by teachers on school property) distributed an issue of its newspaper containing an endorsement of two candidates. Upon being notified of the contents of the newspaper, an assistant superintendent confiscated the issue.

The Association's grievance against the board contended that (a) the Association had not engaged in political activity prohibited by the contract since the newspaper was distributed solely to teachers and the candidates endorsed were not teachers, (b) confiscation violated the contractual rights of the Association to use the mailboxes to communicate with its members, (c) the confiscation violated teachers' rights under Michigan's Public Employee Relations Act to engage in activities for their protection, and (d) the confiscation violated teachers' rights to free speech under the federal Constitution.

The board contended that the distribution of the newspaper was a violation of the contract which stipulated that "the political activities of any teacher. . .campaigning for a candidate shall be conducted. . .off school premises and outside working hours," that as trustee of school property, the board could not allow school mailboxes to be used to foster political campaigns or other special interest, and that the board had the authority to order the removal of the newspaper from school mailboxes under the state statute granting it general power to manage the schools and preserve school property.

Ruling in favor of the Association, the arbitrator held that the distribution of the newspaper was not prohibited by the contract because it was distributed only among teachers and the candidates endorsed were not teachers. Further, the board's responsibility as a trustee was not involved because no additional funds or facilities beyond the mailboxes, which were already provided, were used to distribute the issue of the newspaper. The confiscation according to the arbitrator, was an unfair labor practice because it violated the contractual right of the Association to use mailboxes to communicate with its members because under the First Amendment to the federal Constitution, teachers individually and collectively through their Association have rights of free speech including the right to endorse candidates for elections. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Perry v. Sindermann, (403 U.S. 597, (1972)) held that the government cannot infringe upon the exercise of a person's constitutionally protected rights, especially the rights of free speech, "to produce a result which it could not directly command." Therefore, the board's denying the Association its contractual right to use mailboxes, when that right was used for the purpose of endorsing candidates, constituted an unlawful infringement on teachers' rights of free speech.

The arbitrator, however, denied an Association request to order the board and its employees to refrain from further similar actions on the grounds that he lacked authority to do more than resolve the issue presented to him. (Wayne-Westland Education Association and Board of Education, Wayne-Westland Community Schools, May 22, 1974.)

NEVADA

Employer Has Right To RIF But Order of Discharge and Re-employment Is Negotiable

Management has the right to decide when a reduction is necessary, the number of employees to be terminated, and the areas where reduction shall occur. However, "the order in which personnel. . .shall be discharged and any rights they may possess after discharge with regard to preference in re-employment are conditions of employment" and subject to mandatory bargaining. Employee-Management Relations Board ruled that the Mineral County School District was required to negotiate with the Mineral County Classroom Teachers Association on the latter's proposal of procedures to be used for implementing a reduction in force.

The Association made its proposal when a possible reduction in staffing at a military installation, the county's main source of employment, threatened to cause a drastic decline in enrollment and funding. The district refused to negotiate, contending that the subject of the proposal was a management prerogative. The Association filed a complaint with the Board, contending that its proposal was a condition of employment and subject to mandatory negotiations.

Ruling in favor of the Association, the Board noted that the Nevada Local Government Employee Relations Act "obviously envisions circumstances where the procedures for the reduction of the teaching force would be contained in a written contract." Citing the decision of the Federal Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in the case of N.L.R.B. v. Royal Plating and Polishing Company, 350 F2d. 191 (1965), which held that while an employer of a failing business has no duty to bargain regarding its decision to shut down, it must notify the union of its intentions so that the union may bargain over the rights of the employees affected, the Board concluded that a "similar approach is warranted in the public sector where the necessity for a reduction in force is created by circumstances beyond the control of the local government employer."

The Board ruled that in these circumstances, the order of discharge of personnel and the rights of discharged personnel with regard to preference in re-employment are conditions of employment and subject to mandatory bargaining. (Mineral County Classroom Teacher's Association v. Mineral County School District, Nevada Local Government Employee-Management Relations Board, June 20, 1974.)

NEW JERSEY

Substitute Serving As Full-Time Employee Entitled to Tenure

Finding that the Newark Board of Education had exceeded its authority in dismissing a teacher whose tenure was disputable, the commissioner of education ordered reinstatement of the employee and all retroactive compensation due him.

Before a hearing examiner, the teacher contended that he had satisfied tenure requirements, and that his termination was, therefore, discriminatory. The board argued that he had falsified a timesheet and had not qualified for tenure because he was hired as a per-diem substitute and lacked proper certification even as a long-term substitute.

The hearing examiner found no evidence to support the discrimination charge, and in view of the fact that it was difficult to determine whether the teacher was regularly employed for sufficient time so as to have acquired tenure status, he referred the matter to the commissioner.

For tenure New Jersey state law requires service for three consecutive calendar years, or any shorter period, as determined by the board; or three consecutive academic years in conjunction with employment at the beginning of the next successive academic year; or the equivalence of more than three academic years within any four consecutive academic years. Under these provisions and basing his decision, in part, on Ruth L. Yanowitz et al. v. Board of Education of Jersey City, which held that long-term substitute teaching, under certain conditions, can be considered a full-time teaching assignment, the commissioner ruled that the teacher's service was clearly not that of a substitute, but of a tenured employee. Although the board had failed to recognize and accord the teacher with tenure accrual, he was, nonetheless, a regular employee, was paid a yearly salary, and possessed full state certification in accordance with the statutory prescription acknowledging tenure acquisition when a teacher has rendered the required service for a given period. The commissioner further concluded that even by the board's calculation the teacher was regularly employed for approximately three years, and under such circumstances, the prior period in question should be applied as a tenure accrual.

The commissioner ordered reinstatement and retroactivity of salary and other benefits. (Richard Glover, v. Board of Education of the City of Newark, Acting Commissioner of Education, July 26, 1974)

NEW YORK

Board's Unilateral Change in Health Leave Policy Held Improper

In a case brought against the Plainedge Union Free School District by the Plainedge Federation of Teachers, the New York State Public Employment Relations Board held the school board's unilateral change in a health leave policy improper.

Shortly before December 13, 1973, the union president received a copy of the agenda of the school board meeting. The agenda contained an item, "disposition of resolution to revise the health leave policy." When shown a copy of the revised policy by the superintendent, the union president asked for a copy to be mailed to him and for time to review it. He also asked that the matter be tabled so that it could be discussed between the parties.

On December 14 the superintendent sent the union president a copy of the proposed policy together with a letter explaining the purpose of the new policy. The union president reviewed the proposed policy with the union executive board.

On January 9, 1974, the union president received a copy of the agenda for the January 10 meeting of the school board. The agenda again included the proposed health leave policy. The union president then asked the president of the school board to table the matter to give the union time to negotiate it with the school board, but the school board adopted the new policy.

On February 13, the union filed an improper practice charge, contending that the school district refused to negotiate and unilaterally changed the health leave policy. The school district denied the charge and asserted that the health policy was a matter for advisory arbitration.

At the hearing the school district maintained that according to the current agreement with the union it had the right to change the health leave policy. Furthermore, the failure of the union to request a meeting with the school board between December 14 and January 10 constituted a waiver of negotiation rights.

PERB held that the school district unilaterally modified terms and conditions of employment by reducing the length of health leave for teachers, a substantial change in employment conditions, and that since there was no specific agreement on a time limit for negotiation, the union's failure to request a meeting between December 14 and January 10 did not constitute a waiver of its right to negotiation. PERB, therefore, ordered the school district to cease and desist from unilaterally modifying the health leave policy. (Plainedge Union Free School District v. Plainedge Federation of Teachers, New York State Public Employment Relations Board, June 19, 1974)

PENNSYLVANIA

Lockout As a Bargaining Tactic Does Not Violate NLRB

The use of a lockout solely to support a legitimate bargaining position does not violate the National Labor Relations Act on state law. Therefore, the Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board ruled that the New Castle Area School District was not guilty of an unfair labor practice when it would not allow teacher aides to return to their jobs until a new contract was negotiated and the funding for these positions was established.

During negotiations with the New Castle Association of School Service Personnel, the district took the position that teacher aides would not be permitted to work without a contract, because Title I money had not been approved for teacher aides, and "that without agreement as to wages it was impossible to determine whether adequate funds would be available under the Title I grant." After an agreement was reached, the aides returned to work.

The union filed a complaint with the Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board, charging the district with a lockout in violation of the National Labor Relations Act. Ruling in favor of the district, PLRB cited the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in American Ship Building Company, [380 U.S. 300] which held that "the use of a lockout solely in support of a legitimate bargaining position was not violative of the National Labor Relations Act." In the present case, PLRB ruled that the employer's action was not "designed to coerce, restrain or discourage membership in the union" but was simply a bargaining tactic. (PLRB v. New Castle Area School District, Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board, June 27, 1974)

FEDERAL

NLRB Declines Jurisdiction over Howard University

Owing to Howard University's "unique relationship" with the federal government, the National Labor Relations Board declined to accept jurisdiction, and dismissed a petition from Teamster Local 246, requesting the NLRB to order a representation election among the full-time faculty at the Howard University law school. NLRB reasoned that effective collective bargaining at the university would entail the involvement of federal agencies over which it (the Board) would have no jurisdiction.

The Teamsters claimed that Howard was a private institution, similar to Cornell where the NLRB had previously accepted jurisdiction. The university, citing the NLRB decision in the case of Temple University, sought dismissal of the petition on the ground that its relationship with the federal government removed it from NLRB jurisdiction.

In examining Howard's relationship with the federal government, the NLRB made the following observations: (a) Howard University was established by Congress; (b) half of its total academic budget from 1965 to 1972 was derived from Congressional appropriations; (c) its expenditures of federal monies were subject to supervision and control by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, by the General Services Administration in the area of construction, and by Congress, to whom Howard had to submit an annual report; (d) the University classified its non-faculty employees under the wage scales used by the federal government; and (e) salaries of all university employees prior to 1973 were paid by U.S. Treasury checks.

Ruling in favor of Howard, the NLRB concluded that "the federal interest in Howard far exceeds in degree that associated with the government's customary funding of specific university projects." On the ground of this "unique relationship" with the federal government, the NLRB dismissed the Teamsters' petition.

In a dissenting opinion, it was argued that Howard in its relationship with the federal government was not restricted in any way with regard to personnel or labor relations policies, except for statutory benefits which must be paid to former federal employees working in Freedmen's Hospital. Additionally, the decision created an anomalous situation since Howard was already engaged in collective bargaining with several employee groups. Finally, the dissenters argued, unlike Temple University where an alternative authority, the state of Pennsylvania, was capable of asserting jurisdiction, in the case of Howard there was no alternative, and the NLRB by declining jurisdiction was creating a "permanent no-man's land. . .not subject to any legislative attempts at comprehensive regulation," in manifest contradiction to the thrust of section 14c of the Wagner Act. MINNESOTA

Independent Review Hinges on Presence of Contract Rights

On appeal to the Minnesota Supreme Court, two librarians were denied their petition brought against the Polk County Library Board seeking to require the establishment of a panel as provided under the Public Employees Labor Relations Act to review their discharge. The two employees had been terminated by the PCLB without a hearing.

Having been denied a panel by the state mediation board to independently review the discharge and as well as being rebuffed by a district court, the two librarians contended before the appellate court that their rights to a review of the discharge, and their rights to continued employment were abridged as a result of the summary dismissal and the library board's refusal to submit the matters leading to the discharge to an independent review as provided under the state law.

The appellate court noted that neither librarian properly invoked the statutory procedures for review "of any grievance arising out of the interpretation of or adherence to terms and conditions of employment."

The court based its decision on the nature of their contractual relationship with the employer. Finding that neither librarian had any contractual or tenure rights owing to the absence of a negotiated agreement, the employer-employee relationship was terminable at will by either party. Thus, absent an employee's contractual obligation to perform a job, the PCLB was free from any obligation to retain an employee and might terminate that employee at will without showing cause or providing the right to review for cause, unless the dismissed employee could prove a contract to that effect.

Because the court found no controversy over the terms and conditions of employment, it denied the petition for relief on the grounds that the action was not based on state law providing review for denial of a contractual employment relationship. (Avis Boe et al, Appellants v. Polk County Library Board; A Department of Polk County, Respondent, Minnesota Supreme Court, April 19, 1974.)

MISSOURI

Juvenile Court Employees May Unionize

The Missouri Supreme Court ruled that juvenile court employees were public employees entitled to organize and bargain collectively with their employer. The juvenile court sought to stop the Missouri State Board of Mediation from determining whether the Western Missouri Public Employees Local 1812 was entitled to represent employees of the juvenile court.

The juvenile court contended that its employees were not covered by the statute permitting union membership and that the Board of Mediation had no jurisdiction in the matter because its involvement would "constitute an invasion and interference with the powers of the judicial department in violation of the doctrine of separation of powers contained in the 1945 Mo. Const., Art. II. § 1."

The employees contended that because they were employed by a public body, they were covered by the statute and that compliance with the statute would not encroach upon the powers of the employer.

The Supreme Court ruled that the employees were public employees according to the statute because they were paid either by the state of Missouri and/or by Jackson County, a political subdivision. The court then pointed out that when the juvenile court refused to recognize their constitutional right to select a bargaining representative, they could have abandoned their constitutional right or adopted the approach statutorily outlined, mediation. Since the employees selected mediation, the court analyzed the questions before the mediation board and determined that neither of the issues was of interest to the employer. Further, the mediation board's response to the questions would not be considered an invasion of the judicial department.

In conclusion, the state supreme court pointed out that the employer's concern with possible abuse of its powers did not warrant striking down a statute. On the basis of the foregoing, it directed the Board of Mediation to make a determination. (State ex rel. Honorable Timothy D. O'Leary, Presiding Judge, 16th Judicial Circuit et al., Relators v. Missouri State Board of Mediation et al., Respondents, Missouri Supreme Court, April 8, 1974.)

NEW YORK

NYC Mayor and Unions Organize Productivity Council

A joint productivity program designed to secure better service without spending additional city revenue has been established by the New York City mayor and leaders of four unions. Since productivity has been a basic issue in municipal bargaining agreements among nonuniformed employees, sanitationmen, police, and correction officers, the newly organized Productivity Council is expected to make productivity a continuing effort. Viewed by the mayor as a significant step in creating a new era of cooperation between the city and labor unions, the council is expected to expand as agreements are negotiated with other unions.

FEDERAL

Employer Obligated To Provide Information Necessary and Relevant to the Processing of a Grievance

According to the National Labor Relations Board, an employer's duty to bargain, under Section 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act, includes the obligation to provide a union with information which is relevant and reasonably necessary to process a grievance. Therefore, the Board sustained charges of unlawful refusal to bargain which were brought against the Trustees of Boston University by the Building and Service Employees International Union, Local 254.

The University notified six painters that they were being laid off owing to a reduction in the budget for physical plant. The paint shop had been selected for elimination allegedly because its services were "least essential." Acting under a contract which prohibited the arbitrary and capricious exercise of management rights, the union filed a grievance on behalf of the employees, claiming that the University had acted arbitrarily by eliminating the paint shop, since a good deal of painting was being carried on by subcontracting firms. The union requested from the University copies of the physical plant budgets and painting subcontracts for the current year and the two preceding years to permit it to ascertain whether the University's action was valid. The personnel director refused to supply the information, claiming that the union was not entitled to it, and denied the grievance on the grounds of management rights.

The union filed a petition with the National Labor Relations Board, charging that the University's refusal to supply information which was relevant and necessary to the processing of a grievance constituted unlawful refusal to bargain under section 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act. The University replied that its action was not arbitrary and offered arguments which had not been presented to the union previously.

Ruling in favor of the union, an administrative law judge held that an employer is obligated to provide a union with information which is relevant and reasonably necessary to evaluate the merits of a grievance in order to decide whether to pursue it or drop it, and that in the present case, the information requested was relevant. The judge concluded that the University had violated its duty to bargain under the NLRA. Exclusion of Maternity Benefits from California's Disability Coverage Held Constitutional

After reviewing a federal trial court decision, the Supreme Court of the United States upheld the constitutionality of a provision of the California Unemployment Insurance Code, which excluded maternity-related disability from its disability coverage. The Court held that this exclusion did not violate the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment to the federal Constitution because the program covered all other risks to which women are subject. According to the high Court, the equal protection clause does not require the state to insure all risks, and "there is nothing in the Constitution that requires the State to subordinate or compromise its legitimate interests solely to create a more comprehensive social insurance program than it already has." The Court defined legitimate interests to include: (a) maintaining the self-supporting nature of an insurance program, (b) keeping benefit payments for disabilities at an adequate level, and (c) maintaining the contribution level at a rate that will not unduly burden participating low-income employees.

The case involved four women, private employees, who were generally eligible for payments from the California Unemployment Compensation Disability Fund. This fund provides payments for private employees, who are temporarily disabled and unable to work because of an illness not covered by Workmen's Compensation. The categories of disability not covered included a single disability exceeding 26 weeks, or less than 8 days without hospitalization; court commitment as an alcoholic, drug addict, or sexual psycopath; and any illness caused by or arising from pregnancy. The women, who suffered unemployment disabilities because of pregnancy, challenged the pregnancy exclusion as a violation of the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment of the federal Constitution. The state contended that inclusion of pregnancy-related illnesses in the coverage would make it impossible to maintain a self-supporting program within the existing level of employee contributions.

The Federal District Court ruled in favor of the women on the ground that the exclusion was "not based upon a classification having a rational and substantial relationship to a legitimate state purpose," and concluded that increased cost could be accommodated through minor adjustments of the rate of employee contribution, the maximum benefits payable, and other variables affecting the solvency of the program.

The Supreme Court, on appeal, reversed the lower court decision on the grounds that exclusion of maternity benefits, since it discriminates against a class of risk and not a class of persons, does not violate the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment of the federal Constitution, and that California's policy of maintaining a self-supporting program, an adequate level of benefits, and a contribution rate that would not unduly burden low-income employees represented a legitimate state interest which the state did not have to compromise solely to increase coverage.

A dissenting opinion argued that excluding from coverage disabilities suffered only by women, while including coverage of disabilities suffered primarily or exclusively by men, such as hemophilia, and prostatectomies, "inevitably constitutes sex discrimination." In previous cases the Supreme Court had ruled that such discrimination could be justified only if the state could demonstrate that "the challenged legislation serves overriding or compelling interests that can not be achieved either by a more carefully tailored legislative classification or the use of feasible, less drastic means." The state "must do more than show that denying benefits to the excluded class saves money." California's legitimate interest in fiscal integrity could easily have been served through a variety of less drastic, sexually neutral means. (Dwight Gedulig, et al., v. Carolyn Aiello, et al., U. S. Supreme Court, June 17, 1974.)

THE CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—NOVEMBER 1974

The Consumer Price Index rose 0.8 percent in November to 154.3 (1967=100), the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the U.S. Department of Labor reported. The rise was due to higher prices for a wide variety of consumer goods and services, including most types of food, clothing, natural gas, mortgage interest costs, and housekeeping supplies. The effect of these increases was partially offset by declines in prices for beef, fresh fruits, eggs, and gasoline.

On a seasonally adjusted basis, the rise in the November CPI was 0.9 percent, the same as in October. Each of the three major components of the index rose about as much as in October. The increase in the food index, 1.4 percent after seasonal adjustment, marked the fourth consecutive month of rapid rise. The index for nonfood commodities rose 0.8 percent in November, slightly more than in October but much less than the average monthly increase of 1.2 percent in the first 9 months of this year. The services index also rose 0.8 percent in November, compared with an average monthly increase of a little over 1.0 percent in the preceding 6 months.

The November CPI was 12.1 percent higher than in November 1973. During this same period, the food index rose 11.9 percent, the index for commodities other than food rose 13.5 percent, and the services index rose 10.9 percent.

Monthly changes in detail (not seasonally adjusted)

The index for food purchased in grocery stores increased 1.1 percent, instead of declining as it usually does in November. Prices averaged higher for most types of food except beef, fresh fruits, and eggs. Prices for sugar and products for which sugar is an important ingredient continued to rise rapidly and accounted for a substantial part of the November increase in food prices. Fresh vegetable prices rose more than they usually do in November. Pork and poultry prices also increased, but beef prices declined seasonally, as did fresh fruits and eggs. The index for food away from home—restaurant meals and snacks—increased 0.9 percent, about the same as in recent months.

The index for nonfood commodities increased 0.8 percent. Higher prices for apparel commodities were responsible for almost a fourth of the rise. Prices for housekeeping supplies, tobacco products, floor coverings, appliances, houses, and fuel oil continued to increase rapidly. Prices also rose for other commodities such as furniture, toilet goods, alcoholic beverages, reading materials, and used cars, but increases were smaller than in recent months. New car prices rose in November, but much less than in October. Gasoline prices declined for the fourth consecutive month but remained about 26 percent above year earlier levels.

The services index rose 0.8 percent in November. Over three-fifths of the increase was due to higher charges for all types of household services, including rent. Charges for residential gas rose sharply. Mortgage interest costs continued to rise, reflecting earlier increases in interest rates on conventionally financed loans. Increases in charges for medical care, personal care, apparel, recreational, and transportation services also contributed to the rise in the services index. Among transportation services, taxicab fares and parking fees rose sharply, and charges for auto insurance turned up after declining almost steadily in the preceding 5 months.

TEACHER STRIKES, 1973-74

In the 1973-74 school year, NEA Research recorded 154 teacher strikes involving more than 74,000 teachers and an estimated 718,000 man-days of instruction.

A teacher strike is any concerted group action which disrupts the regularly scheduled instruction time for at least one school day. The data are not adjusted downward when teachers in a school system are involved in more than one strike in a school year, or when days lost owing to strikes are rescheduled to meet state minimum attendance requirements. A strike may be initiated in and affect a single school building, a local school district, or a state school system. The duration of a strike is measured by the instructional day, those days on which classes are scheduled; they do not include teacher working days before the opening or after the closing of school, teacher orientation days, in-service days, holidays, or week ends.

The 154 strikes occurred in 20 states, and ranged from 1 day to the unsettled strikes in Timberlane, New Hampshire; and Hortonville, Wisconsin.

Fewer

Fewer than 1 teacher in 25 was involved in strikes; man-days of instruction lost totaled less than 1/5 of 1 percent of the estimated man-days of instruction for the entire United States. Four states, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, and Pennsylvania, accounted for almost 70 percent of the total man-days of instruction lost. The total number of man-days of instruction was calculated by multiplying the estimated total instructional staff in 1973-74 by an assumed 180-day instructional year.

CLASS SIZE

The Board and the C.E.A. recognize that the teacher-pupil ratio is an important aspect of an effective educational program. Whenever possible under the circumstances (availability of facilities and financial resources) the maximum number of pupils per teacher shall be as follows:

Kindergarten—Grade 6	25-30 pupils
Grade 7-12 Academic	25-30 pupils
Laboratory and Shop	18-24 pupils
Special Education (E.M.R.)	12-24 pupils

Teachers are to report to their buildings 30 minutes and to their classroom 10 minutes before classes begin and are to remain 15 minutes after classes are dismissed; however, on Fridays, or the day before vacations or professional days, teachers may leave five minutes after classes are dismissed; teachers whose college classes or travel time to classes require early departure from their school building may, upon request, be permitted to leave immediately after completion of classroom duties; the superintendent and a committee of two teacher representatives (elementary and secondary levels) appointed by the association president will prepare a recommended school calendar. "As much help as possible under existing financial conditions and building facilities should be offered to teachers in providing meaningful programs for under achievers and/or emotionally disturbed children"; all monitoring and observation of the performance of the teacher will be conducted openly and with full knowledge of the teacher; "no teacher shall be disciplined, reprimanded, reduced in rank or compensation or deprived of any professional advantage without just cause. Any such discipline, reprimand, or reduction in rank, compensation or advantage including adverse evaluation of teacher performance or violation of professional ethics asserted by the Board or any agent or representative thereof shall be subject to the Professional Grievance Procedure hereinafter set forth."

PERSONNEL: Grievance procedure ends with board of education; any unjust discipline, reprimand, reduction in rank, compensation, or advantage, including adverse evaluation of a teacher, is subject to the grievance procedure; teachers have the right to review their personnel files; building faculty meetings which extend the school day by not more than 15 minutes may be called semi-monthly; district-wide faculty meetings which may extend the school day by not more than one hour may be called a maximum of four times annually; hours earned up the attainment of the master's degree are reimbursable under the professional growth program; teachers may receive one of two kinds of contracts, a limited contract which may be extended for not more than five years or a continuing contract which will remain in effect until the teacher resigns or retires, or until it is teminated or suspended by the board; an inexperienced teacher will receive three one-year contracts and then, if doing satisfactory work and having either a life permanent or professional certificate, a continuing contract; experienced teachers will receive two one-year limited contracts and then a continuing contract if doing satisfactory work and having proper certification; monitoring and observation of the performance of the teacher will be conducted openly and with full knowledge of the teacher; because frequent transfers of teachers disrupt the educational process, the Association and the board agree that the transfers should be minimal; when a reduction in the number of teachers in a school is necessary, all volunteers will be transferred first if possible; new teachers must submit a report of a complete physical examination before commencing duties; all employees are required by law to have an annual tuberculosis test; any parent or student having a complaint against a teacher will confer with the teacher; if this does not resolve the problem, the principal will confer with the parties; if such conferences still do not resolve the problem, the complainant should submit his signed complaint to the principal who will forward it to the superintendent and notify the teacher, in writing.

RETRENCHMENT

Among the part-time employees in the Department or program before full-time employees are terminated.

Among full-time employees holding academic rank, such termination shall be made from those holding temporary appointments, and from those holding term appointments before the termination of employees holding continuing appointments. Such removal shall be made in the inverse order of appointment within each such group.

Among full-time professional employees, such termination shall be made in the inverse order of original appointment, provided, however, such removal shall be made from among employees having temporary appointments before the removal of employees having term appointments.

The Board will notify the persons affected as soon as practicable recognizing that, where circumstances permit, it is desirable to provide the following notice of termination:

For those holding a term appointment, at least four months.

For those holding a continuing appointment, at least one semester.

Persons removed as a result of retrenchment shall be advised of the opportunity for reemployment in the same or a similar position at the college for a period of two years, and must accept such offer within 15 days after such offer, such acceptance to take effect not later than the beginning of the semester immediately following the date such offer was made. The College shall make every reasonable effort to place an incumbent so separated within the College, provided that a suitable position for which the person is otherwise qualified is available for such appointment.

The original appointment shall mean the date of first appointment to College service, followed by continuous and uninterrupted service within the College up to the time of reduction and abolishment of positions. Authorized leave of absence at full salary or without salary shall not be deemed an interruption of service with the College. In the event an incumbent believes such date has been incorrectly determined, he shall so advise the college, and indicate the date he believes to be correct.

CRITERIA FOR PROMOTION

Teaching effectiveness is the prime criterion in determining the worth of a teacher. The department chairmen, the deans, and the President will use all appropriate means to determine fairly the relative effectiveness of individual teachers. Consideration will be given to information received on student evaluation forms and to observations made during class visits by the department chairmen and by the Dean.

Subordinate to teaching effectiveness, but contributing to it, are the following criteria, all of which may be considered to determine an individual's eligibility for promotion: productive scholarship (work on and/or publication of papers or books on one's special field); Professional improvement, experience (years of duty as a teacher); committee work (supervision of student activities); community activity (participation in extramural activities which may serve, directly or indirectly, the best interests of the college).

In addition to the criteria set forth in paragraphs (a) and (b) above, consideration will be given to those personal characteristics which promote the smooth functioning of faculty-student, faculty-administration and intra-faculty relationships.

DEPARTMENT CHAIRMEN

The Department Chairman shall have administrative responsibility for the program of the department under the Dean; cooperate with department members in planning programs; evaluate the instructional, administrative processes of the department and make recommendations to the Dean; evaluate periodically the department members and report the evaluations as required; recommend appointments, reappointments, promotions and dismissals of department members; insure that adequate supervision, advice and training are provided to new department members and others who might profit therefrom; generally promote the welfare of the department and the college by every appropriate means; and carry out such other duties as are set forth elsewhere by the college.

When the position of department chairman becomes vacant, the Search Committee composed of five members, four of which are faculty members, will solicit names of possible candidates, interview the candidates in conjunction with the dean, and submit to the president of the college the names of acceptable candidates; if the president does not accept any of the candidates suggested, he will explain his decision to the Committee and will request the Committee to continue its search until a candidate acceptable to all parties is found; if in the opinion of the faculty the department chairman is not fulfilling his responsibilities, they will, by a petition signed by two-thirds of the eligible voting faculty members of the department, initiate reappointment procedures.

> If, in an administrator's evaluation (presently submitted in November and February) a teacher is judged below average, or if he is rated poor in any of the evaluation categories, he shall receive immediate written notification of that fact and may have a conference with the appropriate administration. If the teacher fails to improve within a reasonable time as specified by the evaluator on the evaluation form, he may be placed on probation for the subsequent contract year.

DELAWARE

Mandamus Writ Not Injunction Proper Remedy To Force Good Faith Bargaining

The Delaware Chancery Court denied a request for preliminary injunction sought by the Capital Educators Association (CEA) to enjoin the Capital School District from refusing to negotiate in good faith on a new contract. The school board took the position that it would not negotiate until CEA agreed that both parties be governed by a set of ground rules proposed by the board. One of the proposed rules was that all items for discussion be submitted in writing to the board at the first negotiations meeting.

CEA contended that the board was refusing to negotiate in good faith because the demand that the Association restrict itself to issues presented at the onset of negotiations was an illegal attempt "to curtail the lawful right of its members to bargain on new issues which might be brought to light during negotiations."

The board contended that its demand was not illegal because the statute authorizing collective bargaining did not require it to negotiate on a few issues at a time without knowing what all of the issues would be. The board also pointed out that there was no immediate danger of harm to the Association since the present contract did not expire for two months. Additionally, the present court had no jurisdiction in this case because the CEA was attempting to compel the board to carry out a function required by law.

The court found no immediate threat of harm to CEA since the present contract had not expired. However, the court noted that should the situation not change by the upcoming fall, there was a likelihood that harm would come. Nonetheless, the court pointed out that in order to issue a preliminary injunction the party seeking the injunction must be in immediate danger of inevitable and irreparable injury.

The court then pointed out that the statute mandated, and did not leave to discretion, a party to meet and confer in good faith at the request of the other party. For CEA to compel the board to perform its statutory duty the Association must seek mandamus action, wherein a party is coerced to perform a pre-existing duty, over which the immediate court has no jurisdiction. On the basis of the foregoing the preliminary injunction was denied and the complaint was dismissed. (Capital Education Association, Plaintiff v. Harry F. Camper et al., Defendants, Delaware Chancery Court, May 2, 1974.)

FLORIDA

Court Must Accept Application for Writ of Mandamus

A Florida Court of Appeal was ordered by the Florida Supreme Court to accept the application for a writ of mandamus filed by the Monroe Education Association to compel the Monroe County School Board to show cause for not engaging in collective bargaining with the Association. The clerk for the District Court rejected the petition, stating that "this application is not ancillary to any matter pending in this court and therefore cannot be filed here."

Citing Couse v. Canal Authority, the Supreme Court pointed out that issuance of a constitutional writ is not dependent upon or totally ancillary to independent appellate proceedings. Although the Supreme Court usually does not supervene and take jurisdiction from lower courts, it will do so when a case involves extraordinary circumstances that affect public interest or emergency situations that require expedition. The court then pointed out that an appellate court's ability to handle extraordinary or emergency situations is hampered if applications for constitutional writs are rejected on the basis that they are not ancillary to any matter pending in the appellate court. The court concluded that the clerk's rejection on behalf of the court was improper. (Monroe Education Association, Petitioner v. Clerk, District Court of Appeals, Florida Supreme Court, July 24, 1974.)

MAINE

Municipal Public Employees Labor Relations Act Controls Interest Arbitration; Uniform Arbitration Act Controls Grievance Arbitration

The Maine Judicial Supreme Court held that while interest arbitration relating to disputes arising out of the formation of a collective bargaining agreement was controlled by the Municipal Public Employees Labor Relations Act, grievance arbitration which settles disputes arising out of the interpretation of an existing contract was controlled by the Uniform Arbitration Act. Therefore, the Court sustained the appeal of the Maine School Administrative District 5 Teachers Association to order a trial court to confirm an arbitrator's award after the District had failed to amend its appeal of an arbitrator's decision according to the procedures set up by the Uniform Arbitration Act.

Acting under a collective bargaining agreement which required binding arbitration as the final step in the grievance procedure, an arbitrator ruled on behalf of the Association and ordered the District to reinstate a teacher dismissed on the grounds that "her services were no longer profitable." The District filed a petition in a state trial court, requesting that the arbitrator's award be reversed. In filing this petition, the District assumed that the appropriate appeals procedure in grievance arbitration was governed by the broad scope rules found in the Municipal Public Employees Labor Relations Act and, therefore, did not state any grounds for its appeal since such a statement was not required under that statute.

The Association, however, contended that the appellate procedure in grievance arbitration was governed by the Uniform Arbitration Act and, therefore, moved to dismiss the District's petition since it failed to state grounds for appeal. The trial court denied the Association's motion and held that the District was entitled to an opportunity to amend its petition in accord with the requirements of the Uniform Arbitration Act.

When the District failed to amend its petition within three months after the date of the award, the Association, following the procedure set out in the Uniform Arbitration Act, requested the trial court to confirm the arbitrator's award. The trial court refused to confirm the award, without giving an explanation, whereupon the Association appealed to the Maine Judicial Supreme Court.

Ruling on behalf of the Association, the Court held that the language of the Municipal Public Employees Labor Relations Act indicated that the state legislature intended to approve collective bargaining for municipal employees and provide means for settling disputes arising out of the formation of a labor contract. Therefore, while the arbitration of these disputes, interest arbitration, was within the purview of that statute, grievance arbitration, which settles disputes arising from the interpretation of an existing contract, remained within the control of the Uniform Arbitration Act. While the trial court had correctly permitted the District to amend its original petition, it should have dismissed the petition and confirmed the award when the District failed to amend within 90 days from the date of the award.

The state Supreme Court sustained the Association's appeal and remanded the case to the lower court for confirmation of the award. (Maine School Administrative District 5 v. MSAD 5 Teachers Association, Maine Judicial Supreme Court, August 5, 1974.)

NEW JERSEY

Courts Define Arbitrable Subjects

Despite obscure language and pending definitive legislation, the New Jersey Superior Court ruled in four cases what items are arbitrable in disputes between teachers and boards of education and in one case the scope of bargaining. In determining arbitrable subjects the court used as guidelines the decisions in Dunellen Board of Education v. Dunellen Education Association, where the court held that management has educational responsibilities which cannot be abdicated and therefore cannot be arbitrated, and Board of Education of Englewood v. Englewood Teachers Association, where the court ruled that employment terms and conditions are generally negotiable unless they affect major educational policies.

- In Hillside the court ruled that the following grievances were not arbitrable: (a) the establishment of quiet study duty, (b) reduction in resource aid personnel, (c) a change in the method of assigning home room duty, and (d) a change in the method of weighting teaching and non-teaching duties.
- In Long Beach the court upheld an advisory arbitration of additional pay for law school credits since the interpretation sought would not have any effect on major education policies but would affect terms of employment. In Richard Chabak v. Board of Education of Plainfield the court ruled that whether teachers shall be required to sign in and whether they shall write their full names or initials are managerial prerogatives that have a minimal effect upon the terms and conditions of employment.
- Workload is a negotiable and an arbitrable subject, the court ruled in Englewood where the workload of English teachers at a high school was changed from four class periods a day to five.

In Westwood the court held that state law prohibits negotiation of the board's right to withhold a teacher's salary increment for inefficiency or other good cause. Nonetheless, the court encouraged "timely voluntary discussion" of the matter. (Board of Education, Hillside v. Hillside Education Association, Long Beach Island Board of Education v. Long Beach Island Teachers Association, Richard Chabak v. Board of Education, Plainfield, Board of Education, Englewood v. Englewood Teachers Association, New Jersey Superior Court, July 29, 1974.) (Westwood Education Association v. Board of Education, Westwood, New Jersey Superior Court, June 21, 1974.)

NEW MEXICO

Public Employees Not Covered Under Little Norris-LaGuardia Act

The New Mexico Supreme Court ruled that public employees do not come under the Norris-LaGuardia Act, signifying that government employers may enjoin strikes without adhering to administrative procedures which require a public hearing and specific findings by a trial judge. A district court had included public employees under the scope of the Act, and refused to enjoin the strike.

A five-day walkout by 1,000 city employees led the city to seek an injunction which district judges declined to issue on grounds that the city neither complied with the state little Norris-LaGuardia Act nor satisfied its own administrative regulations through its labor board.

The city appealed to the state Supreme Court, but the strike ended before it could be heard, whereupon the union argued that since the strike was settled, the city's appeal was moot. While it was customary for the Court not to pass upon moot issues, it held that because the questions raised were of such public importance and likely to recur, the matter should be resolved.

Concerning the district court finding that the city failed to resort to administrative procedures before going to court, the Court declared that such action would have been futile since no one denied that a strike—a prohibited practice—had occurred. Furthermore, the Court observed, the imminent threat to the lives and property of the citizenry was sufficient justification for the course taken by the city.

The matter remaining to be resolved was whether New Mexico's little Norris-LaGuardia Act included public employees. The district judges were of the opinion that this group was covered by the Act since it was not specifically excluded. Following the principle of statutory construction which limits the court to giving effect to the express and unambiguous language of the statute and not to rewriting the statute in accordance with its view, the Court noted that because the Act did not specifically include public employees, it must exclude them.

Basing its decision on the position taken by jurisdictions that have the Norris-LaGuardia Act that the Act does not apply to public employees and in the absence of explicit provisions that it does so apply, the state Supreme Court concluded that the district court erred. (City of Albuquerque v. Henry V. Campos, et al., American Federation of Municipal, State and County Employees, Local 624, and Lt. Leonard Ortega, et al., American International Fire Fighters, Local 1455, New Mexico Supreme Court, August 16, 1974.)

NEW YORK

Boards of Education May Enter into Contracts with Untenured Supervisors

According to the New York Supreme Court for Suffolk County, an arbitrator's interpretation of a contract which rests on questions of fact is not reviewable by the courts. The state Education Law expressly permits a board of education to enter into employment contracts with untenured supervisors for one to five years. Therefore, the Court upheld an arbitration award in a dispute involving the Half Hollow Hills Teachers Association and the board of education.

The contract between the board and the Association contained a provision relating to salary differentials which listed the positions of chairmen in three branches of music. When the board decided to eliminate these three positions whose occupants were not tenured and replace them with a single director of music, the Association filed a grievance contending that the provision on differentials required the board to retain the three positions.

An arbitrator ruled in favor of the Association, but deferred a remedy pending further proceedings. The board then filed a petition requesting a state trial court to vacate the arbitrator's "interim award" on the grounds that the arbitrator had exceeded his authority in interpreting the contract and stating that if the arbitrator's interpretation was correct, the contract was illegal under the state Education Law because it restricted the board's authority to establish and maintain supervisory and untenured positions.

The Association requested the Court to dismiss the board's petition, contending that it was improperly filed, that the arbitrator's award was not final or definite, and that the arbitrator had not exceeded his authority.

After rejecting the Association's contentions with respect to the filing of the petition and the finality of the award, the Court ruled in favor of the Association, stating that the arbitrator's interpretation of the contract was not reviewable by the courts since it rested on questions of fact, and that the Education Law expressly permitted the board to enter into employment contracts with untenured supervisors for one to five years. (In re Board of Education Petitioner, Half Hollow Hills Teachers Assn. Respondent, New York Supreme Court, Suffolk County, July 19, 1974.)

Arbitrator Cannot Exceed Contract

Under New York State Education Law, a school board has discretionary power in creating and abolishing positions provided it does not act in a manner which is arbitrary, capricious or "contrary to the best interests of the children," nor does the law require the board to negotiate such matters. Therefore, a New York State trial court vacated an arbitrator's award in a grievance filed by the Rockville Centre Teachers Association on the grounds that the arbitrator had exceeded his authority and divested the Rockville Centre Board of Education of its "innate power and duties under the Education Law."

The board had voted to abolish the positions of two speech teachers on grounds of economy after voters had twice rejected the proposed annual school budget. However, the board contracted with a center for speech disorders to provide a reduced part-time speech therapy program.

The Association filed a grievance with the superintendent, alleging that "the termination of the two speech and hearing staff positions and the subcontracting of said professional duties covered under the terms of our agreement constituted a violation of said agreement."

An arbitrator ruled in favor of the Association, holding that one teacher had in effect been terminated without just cause in violation of the agreement, since the bulk of the work of her position had not been abolished but contracted out, and the contracting out of bargaining unit work without prior negotiation with the Association violated the express terms of the agreement. The arbitrator's award granted the teacher a sum of money equal to that which she lost as the result of termination, directed the board to restore her to her position if work similar to the work she previously performed was to be performed in the coming school year, and directed the board to cease contracting out work without prior negotiation with the Association.

In vacating the arbitration award, the Court held that since nothing in the contract required the board to negotiate prior to or show just cause for the abolition of a position, the arbitrator had exceeded his authority by modifying the terms of the agreement. According to the Court, the award violated the state Education Law since it divested the board of its authority to exercise discretion in creating and abolishing positions, which is limited only by a duty to act in a manner which is not arbitrary, capricious, or "contrary to the best interests of the children." (Rockville Centre Teachers Association v. Board of Education, New York Supreme Court, Nassau County, March 7, 1974.)

OREGON

Broad Scope Bargaining Law Allows for Contract Reopener

The Oregon Court of Appeals ordered the Redmond School District to reopen negotiations with the Redmond Education Association before the expiration of an existing contract for the purpose of negotiating items which were nonnegotiable under the previous state bargaining law. This action gave judicial force to a Public Employment Relations Board ruling which held that under the new state bargaining law a board had to negotiate over items previously excluded even though a valid contract was in existence.

PERB held that since no provision in the agreement specifically prohibited reopening on matters not considered during negotiations, the Association could request such action. The district applied a strict interpretation of the new statute which read: "Nothing in this Act affects a collective bargaining agreement made before the date of this Act."

Interpreting the purpose of the law to be the avoidance of disruptions, the Court declared that the intention could be achieved without requiring teachers to wait for the termination of their contracts before exercising their right to bargain over additional matters. (Redmond School District v. Public Employee Relations Board, Oregon Court of Appeals, October 14, 1974.)

WISCONSIN

Amendment on Final Offer Following Move to Arbitration Rejected

In a case brought by the Milwaukee Deputy Sheriffs' Association against Milwaukee County, the Wisconsin Supreme Court, upon appeal by the county, upheld a lower court decision that struck down a portion of an arbitration award on the grounds that after a petition for final and binding arbitration is filed, no party may amend its final offer to include an offer not previously introduced in the collective bargaining process.

The Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission (WERC) ruled that an impasse existed between the parties. The Association argued that the county's offer to extend the contract came only after the Association filed its petition for final and binding arbitration and should, therefore, not be considered. Nevertheless, the parties proceeded to arbitration in which the arbitrators accepted the county's final offer providing for a long-term contract. Maintaining that the arbitrator exceeded his authority by selecting the county's untimely offer, the Association submitted a motion to WERC to eliminate the contested portion of the arbitrator's award. WERC dismissed the motion on the grounds that the matter was outside its power and should more appropriately be handled in the courts.

Conversely, an award vacating the controversial section of the arbitration decision favoring the Association was ordered by a trial court and supported on the grounds that the principle that "the purported rationale . . . is that final offer selection will induce bargaining since the parties will not make exorbitant demands for fear that the other party's more reasonable position will be adopted as the arbitrator's award."

The appellate court held that permitting arbitrators to select issues raised for the first time after negotiations have closed would have a reverse effect on the legislative intent to provide meaningful and productive negotiation before arbitration. It further determined that if unlimited counter-offers were permitted after the filing of the petition for arbitration, it would be impossible to determine the date of impasse.

In denying the county's appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the lower court decision that the arbitrator exceeded his power in permitting the interjection of a new contract time period in an amended final offer after a petition for arbitration had been filed. (Milwaukee Deputy Sheriffs' Association v. Milwaukee County, Wisconsin Supreme Court, October 1, 1974.)

FEDERAL

Total Pattern of Conduct Demonstrates Refusal To Bargain in Good Faith

While individual actions of a party during negotiations, when taken in isolation, cannot sustain a charge of bad faith bargaining under section 8a of the National Labor Relations Act, bad faith may be inferred from the total pattern of a party's conduct which demonstrates absense of a serious intent to reach an agreement. Therefore, the U.S. Court of Appeals, 2nd Circuit, denied the petition of Continental Insurance Company to set aside an NLRB directive to cease refusing to bargain with the Teamsters local representing its employees in two separate units, to cease making unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment, and to take affirmative action to bargain under the National Labor Relations Act.

The Teamsters local was certified as the bargaining representative for company employees in two bargaining units in March 1968. However, the company did not begin to bargain with the union until December 1969, after the Supreme Court of the United States refused to review a lower federal court decision confirming the appropriateness of the bargaining units and ordering the company to bargain.

During the course of negotiations the union filed charges with the NLRB, alleging that the company had failed to bargain in good faith. The company denied the charges.

In July 1973, the NLRB accepted the report of an Administrative Law Judge which stated that (a) the company had refused to bargain jointly for its two units even though its representative and the union's proposals for both units were identical; (b) the company's initial positions and proposals with respect to vacations, severance pay, wage rates, grievances, and arbitration procedure were "patently unfair" since they offered less than the benefits already existing in the absence of collective bargaining; (c) the company's initial demand that in return for recognition the union agree not to organize other company employees, was outside the scope of mandatory collective bargaining and wholly unreasonable; and (d) the company had unlawfully bypassed the union and dealt directly with the employees, transferring some out of the bargaining unit and adjusting the wages of others while bargaining was taking place.

After the NLRB issued the recommended order, the company petitioned the U.S. Court of Appeals to set aside the order, while the NLRB requested the Court to enforce its order.

Ruling in favor of the Board, the Court, accepted the fact-finding report and concluded that while "some of the Company's bargaining positions and proposals, standing, alone might not support the charges against it," "the totality of circumstances. . .considered upon the record as a whole," indicated that "the Board's findings of unfair labor practices on the part of the Company were supported by substantial evidence." According to the Court, absense of good faith on the part of an employer could be inferred from a pattern of conduct which included: (a) unreasonable fragmentation of bargaining sessions, (b) pointless questioning of the union's proposals, (c) making unnecessarily complicated proposals, (d) making demands outside the scope of collective bargaining, (e) offering less than existing benefits while refusing to grant any benefits over and above those that existed and (f) unilaterally changing working conditions during bargaining. On these grounds, the Court granted the Board's application for enforcement and the company's petition was denied. (Continental Insurance Co. v. NLRB, United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, April 9, 1974.)

State Retirement Plan Must Comply with Federal Law

The U.S. District Court for Connecticut ordered the state to bring its State Employees' Retirement Act into compliance with Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The state retirement system gave women preferential retirement status by permitting them to retire at an earlier age and at a higher monthly pension benefit; this meant that women could retire at age 50 while men had to wait until age 55.

The Connecticut State Employees Association on behalf of all present and past male participants in the state retirement system, charged that the State Employees' Retirement Act violated both the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution and Title VII.

The state argued that this suit was barred by the Eleventh Amendment to the federal Constitution which is interpreted as barring suits for money damages against unconsenting states. In justification of the disparate treatment of men and women, the state pointed out that it originally established the retirement plan with preferred treatment for women to attract women into state employment even though the wages were less than those paid in the private sector. Additionally, the state cited Gruenwald v. Gardner wherein the court upheld a disparity in the computation of federal social security retirement benefits where men and women had equal earnings.

In response to the state's argument that the suit should be barred by the Eleventh Amendment, the Court pointed out that where a state statute is in conflict with a federal statute, the conflict will be resolved on the basis of the supremacy clause of the federal Constitution. The Court then turned to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's discrimination guidelines which state that "it shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employer to have a pension or retirement plan which establishes different optional or compulsory retirement ages based on sex or which differentiates in benefits on the basis of sex."

After denying money damages retroactive to July 2, 1965, and payment of the union's legal fees, the Court cited Eldeman v. Jordan to show that federal courts are without jurisdiction to award a retroactive money payment without the state's prior consent when such payment would have to come from the state's general revenue. The Court then ordered the state to administer its retirement program equitably with regard to retirement age and benefit computations. (Fitzpatrick et al., v. Bitzer, Chairman of the State Employees' Retirement Commission et al., United States District Court, Connecticut, September 16, 1974.)

INDIANA

Athletic Directors, Head Football and Basketball Coaches, and Department Chairmen Excluded from Teachers' Association

The Indiana Education Employment Relations Board ruled that one high-school and two junior high-school athletic directors, head football and basketball coaches, and 34 department chairmen should not be included in the Lawrence Education Association because they have supervisory authority and responsibilites.

The athletic directors were barred because they evaluate coaches, help select, interview, and recommend assignments, and fix the pay schedule for coaches. Head football and basketball coaches were excluded because they have responsibility for the selection of assistants and the general control and direction of their programs. Department chairmen were not included because they do not share a community of interest with other employees, all but seven receive extra compensation, they receive released time to perform duties, and they prepare written teacher evaluations. MASSACHUSETTS

Motion To Dismiss Unfair Practice Complaint for Vagueness Denied

The Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission rejected the Burlington School Committee's motion to dismiss an unfair practice complaint by the Burlington Education Association.

The school committee argued that the complaint failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, and was vague. Finding the allegations not so vague that the committee was unable to prepare a defense, the Commission declared that it could not rule that the Association was not entitled to any relief.

The school committee also argued that the complaint lacked sufficient facts to enable preparation of an appropriate defense. The Commission responded that the basis of the alleged violation existed, thereby affording the committee an opportunity for proper litigation.

Replying to the school committee's argument that the complaint failed to plead sufficient facts that it violated the collective bargaining law, the Commission stated that it could not rule without further evidence to support the school committee's position.

Accordingly, MLRC denied the motion to dismiss and ordered a hearing to establish whether or not the school committee engaged in prohibited conduct. (Matter of Town of Burlington School Committee and Burlington Education Association, Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission, October 24, 1974.)

Grievance Which Bridges Two Statutes Deferred to Compulsory Arbitration

Responding to a complaint filed by a union of state employees, the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission, deferred to arbitration the issue of whether an appointment by the employer, the Department of Public Utilities, was in violation of the contract.

Because the dispute originated before the enactment of a new Collective Bargaining Act, a quandary arose as to whether the matter should be resolved under the old or under the new Act.

In deferring the issues to binding arbitration, the Commission concluded that the legislative intent of the new Act allowed such action by the Commission rather than requiring it to decide the issue. (Massachusetts State Employees Association v. Massachusetts Department of Public Utilities, Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission, September 23, 1974.)

MICHIGAN

School Board Must Reinstate Teacher Dismissed for Union Activity

The Michigan Employment Relations Commission (MERC) ordered the Paw Paw Board of Education to cease terminating employees because of their activities in the Paw Paw Education Association. The case was brought before MERC when the president-elect of the Association, a probationary teacher, was not granted a contract for the coming school year.

The school board contended that reinstatement of the teacher would have the effect of granting tenure in violation of the Michigan Teachers Tenure Act.

On the basis of its ruling in Swartz Creek the Commission said that "it may be reasonable to construe the reinstatement remedy of the Commission as allowing an additional probationary period in the case of an untenured teacher." However, that issue was academic since the teacher had at least another six months to complete his third year of probation in accordance with the rules of the Tenure Act.

Continuing, the Commission pointed out that determining whether the teacher was discriminated against because of union activities was difficult in this case because the teacher was probationary and in evaluating such an employee to determine whether he and the school board should enter into a permanent employment relationship the employer must make a value judgment on the basis of intangible reasons which are difficult to express. Nonetheless, the Commission determined from the record that representatives of the administration had expressed the administration's dissatisfaction with the employee's activities on behalf of the union and his attempts to assert his rights under the collective bargaining agreement. The Commission concluded that the school board terminated the teacher because of his activity on behalf of the Association. Therefore, the Commission ordered the board to cease terminating employees because of their activities on behalf of the Association, to reinstate the employee to his former or substantially equivalent teaching position with back pay with 6 percent interest per annum minus any interim earnings, and to post notice of this decision in conspicuous places at the employer's offices and the various school buildings. (In the Matter of Paw Paw Board of Education, Respondent, and Paw Paw Education Association, Charging Party, Michigan Employment Relations Commission.)

Failure To Agree or Make a Concession Does Not Violate Duty To Bargain

Under Michigan's Public Employment Relations Act, a public employer that initially refused to grant a wage increase and later modified its position had engaged in "permissible hard bargaining" and did not violate its duty to bargain in good faith. In addition, since the Act requires a public employer to bargain with a union that has engaged in an illegal strike, a public employer cannot be prohibited from making concessions after the strike. Therefore, the Michigan Employment Relations Commission, affirmed the decision of an administrative law judge who had dismissed charges of unfair labor practice brought by the Lake Michigan Federation of Teachers against Lake Michigan College.

During negotiations for a new contract the college and the Federation agreed on all issues except salary, the duration of the contract, and the work week of librarians.

The union requested fact-finding and, following the issuance of the fact-finder's report, the college and the Federation reached a tentative salary agreement under which the college would grant increments for experience and education as provided in the preceding contract and reopen negotiations for a salary agreement to cover 1973.

However, the union rejected the agreement and an offer to increase teachers' salaries in 1972-73 on the condition that increments for education and years of experience be eliminated.

The union filed charges with MERC, alleging that the college had violated its duty to bargain in good faith by "asserting positions on a take it or leave it basis, demanding that the employees give up rights and benefits to which they are entitled by law, and refusal to make counterproposals."

The union called a strike, whereupon the college offered to settle the strike by providing larger increases than its previous offers. The union rejected this offer and amended the charges it had filed with MERC, adding as evidence of bad faith the fact that the college had offered larger increases to teachers who were hired during the strike than it had offered to members of the bargaining unit before the strike.

Ruling in favor of the college, an administrative law judge held that the college, while initially refusing to grant a salary increase, had modified its position, and added that even if the college had refused to make any concessions with respect to salary, it would not have violated its duty to bargain in good faith. Its over-all pattern of conduct did not reveal hostility to the union or the bargaining process and did not include actions which independently violated its duty to bargain or other actions revealing intent to avoid reaching an agreement.

Under the National Labor Relations Act and the Michigan Public Employment Relations Act, the duty to bargain in good faith does not require an employer to make a concession or to agree to a proposal. The judge also ruled that since the Public Employee Relations Act requires a public employer to bargain with a union that has engaged in an illegal strike, a public employer cannot be prohibited from making concessions to the union after the strike.

Therefore, the judge held that the college had engaged in permissible "hard bargaining" and dismissed the union's charges. Upon appeal by the union, MERC affirmed the judge's decision. NEVADA

Teacher Salary Increase Ordered After Study of Expected Revenue

Following a comprehensive study of expected revenue, teacher turnover, and student enrollment in the Washoe County School District, and after considering the obligations of the school district and the "reasonableness" of the negotiating parties' situation as specified in a state statute, a fact-finder prescribed an increase in the starting salary of instructors having degrees.

When an impasse on teacher salaries and major benefit proposals resulted from negotiations between the two parties, the governor transferred the matter to fact-finding. While the school district representatives and the Association reached a compromise concerning teacher salaries, they were unable to agree on medical insurance, extra duty pay, and an uninterrupted service requirement submitted by the district.

On the bases of (a) City of Las Vegas, in which priority was the criterion for reasonableness of the parties' position; (b) the decision in Clark County School District v. Clark County Classroom Teachers Association, which emphasized the district's ability to pay, the comparison of salary levels, and the cost of living; and (c) the district's underestimation of its revenue resources, the fact-finder ordered the district to establish a higher salary base for various levels. (Washoe County School District v. Washoe County Teachers Association, American Arbitration Association, May 5, 1974.)

NEW YORK

Union's Refusal To Bargain on a Management Prerogative Not an Improper Practice

Holding that to establish criteria for evaluating teachers is a management prerogative under the parties' agreement, the New York State Public Employment Relations Board (PERB) dismissed an improper practice charge filed against the Pearl River Teachers Association (PRTA).

The charge was brought by the Pearl River Union Free School District which alleged that the union violated the Public Employees' Fair Employment Act by refusing to negotiate in good faith with the intent of developing an evaluation instrument for teacher evaluation.

The parties' agreement provided for a timetable and a committee of PRTA and school district appointees. PRTA's executive board rejected the committee's recommendations. PRTA dissolved its committee and recommended that its membership reject the committee's approach to evaluation of teachers.

Then PRTA requested meetings with the school district to develop an evaluation instrument, but the district sought to have PRTA reconstitute its committee. However, PRTA maintained that it no longer saw a need to continue work on the evaluation instrument since the committee failed to meet the time schedule provided in the agreement.

The school district contended that PRTA's refusal to continue any further participation in the committee meetings constituted a violation of its obligation to negotiate in good faith regarding a mandatory subject of negotiations which the parties had agreed upon during the term of the contract.

Disagreeing with the contention that the teacher evaluation instrument was a mandatory subject of bargaining, PERB found that the evaluation instrument was a device to establish criteria for the evaluation of teachers. PERB said that establishment of such criteria was clearly a management prerogative and that the development of an evaluation instrument was a permissive rather than a mandatory subject of negotiations.

Concluding, PERB ruled that PRTA's refusal to continue to meet with the district did not constitute a violation of the Act. Although its ruling favored the union, PERB stated that the obvious consequence of its ruling was that the school district had the right to unilaterally develop and implement a new teacher evaluation instrument, subject only to its obligation to negotiate with PRTA regarding the effect of such a change on terms and conditions of employment. (Pearl River Teachers Association, Local 1969, NYSUT, AFL-CIO, v. Pearl River Union Free School District, New York State Public Employment Relations Board, February 26, 1974.)

Hearing Officer Erred in Dismissing Improper Practice as Untimely

Remanding a dispute to be resolved through the grievance procedure, the New York State Public Employment Relations Board reversed a hearing officer's decision which dismissed as untimely an improper practice charge filed by the Susquehanna Valley Teachers Association (SVTA) against the Susquehanna Valley Central School District. The dispute centered on a negotiated provision which in ambiguous language provided that salary impasse would be decided under Taylor Law procedure for resolving disputes rather than by a legislative hearing.

The contract negotiated between the Susquehanna Valley Central School District and the Susquehanna Valley Teachers Association provided for the establishment of a joint committee to make recommendations for an alternative salary plan subject to negotiations under the Taylor Law. Conflict over the composition of the committee resulted in abandonment, leading to direct negotiations between the parties. Objecting that it was not obliged to negotiate, the Association protested when the school district referred the impasse to the school board for a legislative determination.

The legislative determination having been issued, the Association charged that the contract did not provide for the invocation of this type of impasse procedure. Noting a significant time lapse between the invocation of impasse procedure and the actual filing of the charge, the hearing officer dismissed the charge as not being timely.

Arguing before the full PERB that there was a distinction between a legislative determination and other impasse procedures provided in CSL § 209 and that only the legislative determination permitted terms and conditions of employment to be imposed upon it, the Association charged that the attempt to impose terms and conditions of employment through a legislative determination was improper. The Association stated that its participation in other procedures did not signify a waiver of its right not to be subjected to a legislative determination, and affirmed that there was no reason to file a charge earlier.

While agreeing with the Association's analysis and finding the charge to have been timely, PERB was unable to determine whether the contract providing that the dispute shall become subject to negotiations under the Taylor Law included the invocation of a legislative determination. PERB recommended that the parties resolve the issue by a contractual interpretation through the grievance procedure and deferred the matter to arbitration. The Board also ordered that the improper practice charge be dismissed, subject to a motion to reopen if specific conditions were met. (Susquehanna Valley Teachers Association v. Susquehanna Valley Central School District, New York Public Employment Relations Board, May 23, 1974.)

PENNSYLVANIA

Employer's Unilateral Cut in Wages a Violation of Collective Bargaining Agreement

The Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board issued a cease and desist order to the West Mifflin Area School District when, contrary to the previous agreement, the district unilaterally cut wage increases for extracurricular duties of coaches.

During negotiations following a strike, agreement was reached to give extra pay to coaches of various sports, notwithstanding the fact that the strike had made it impossible for the coaches to perform their duties.

Later, when the school district proposed a cut in the coaches' pay because of the latter's inability to perform their duties during the strike, the union, representing the coaches, refused to consent to such an arrangement.

The Board observed that, in accordance with the Public Employee Relations Act, the certification of a bargaining unit precluded any unilateral action, and that both sides were required to bargain in good faith. Thus, the Board held that the school district's unilateral action in reducing the amount to be paid the coaches was in violation of the bargaining requirement of Section 903 of the Public Employee Relations Act and its mandatory requirement to arbitrate the issue. (Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board v. West Mifflin Area School District, Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board, September 16, 1974.)

Board Cannot Stall Bargaining Because of "Outside" Negotiator

The Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board ordered the Northern Lebanon School District to cease and desist from interfering with the Northern Lebanon Education Association's rights by attempting to dictate the make-up of the Association's bargaining team. The school district refused to continue bargaining with the Association after the first bargaining session because the Association negotiating team included a professional employee from another school district.

The school district contended that the Association's "use of an 'outside' negotiator would interject, into the negotiation, thoughts and concepts which would be foreign to the interests of the professional employees that make up the bargaining unit" thereby prolonging negotiations.

The Board overturned the employer's argument as tenuous and meaningless, and stated that the school district's action violated Sections 401 and 301 of the Public Employee Relations Act which provided that public employees may "bargain collectively through representatives of their own free choice" and defined bargaining representative as any individual acting for public employers or employees. Concluding, the Board emphasized the untenability of the employer's argument by pointing out that the school district wanted to use a professional negotiator of its own choosing and yet deny this same right to the Association. (PLRB and Northern Lebanon School District, Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board, June 24, 1974.)

WERC Clarifies Negotiable Items

Clarifying negotiable items for teachers and school boards, the Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission ruled that school boards must negotiate items directly affecting teachers' job security, but are not required to bargain educational policy. However, when educational policies affect teaching loads and salaries, boards must negotiate that impact. According to the WERC, class size is an educational policy not subject to mandatory bargaining, but because class size affects teachers' work load, the impact of class size "as it affects hours, conditions of employment and salaries" is negotiable.

Clarification of negotiable items was requested in separate actions by the Beloit school board and education association and Oak Creek school board and education association. The Wisconsin Association of School Boards, the League of Wisconsin Municipalities, the Milwaukee Teachers' Education Association, Madison Teachers, and Green Bay Teachers Education Association also joined the suits.

Items that the Beloit Education Association wanted to bargain included teacher evaluation together with selection of evaluators, access to teacher files and opportunity to respond to materials therein, right to representation when warnings or discipline are given, order of layoffs and recalls, control over school calendar, removal of disruptive students from class, institution of a reading program, a one-month summer program, and class size. Oak Creek Teachers Association wanted to negotiate class size, teacher contact hours, hiring of additional librarians, a pilot program for emotionally disturbed students, regulation of interns and paraprofessionals, establishment of department heads and unit chairpersons, and formulation of a committee on resource centers and a committee to investigate inservice programs.

Following discussion of the proposals submitted by the two associations, WERC ruled that school boards must negotiate orientation of newly hired teachers to evaluation procedures and standards expected by the employer; length, number, and openness of teacher evaluations; copies of observation reports and complaints and defenses to evaluations; right to refute reports in personnel file; right to representation when warned, reprimanded, or disciplined; just cause for dismissal or discipline, copies of charges, and a hearing; procedure for layoff and recall and retention of previous service credits; physical violence by students; school calendar which establishes number of teaching days, inservice days, vacation periods, convention dates, and length of school year; and teacher clerical duties. According to WERC the following items are not mandatory bargaining subjects but may be negotiated if the board wishes or only if the items have an impact upon hours, salaries, or working conditions: class size, teacher-pupil contact hours, establishment of a committee on resource centers, librarians, pilot program for emotionally disturbed students, curriculum studies, regulation of intern teachers and paraprofessionals, committee to investigate and sponsor inservice programs, establishment and reimbursement of department and unit chairpersons, remedial reading program, and summer school program. FEDERAL

NLRB To Rule On Union Bias Before Certification

As a result of an objection to an election at Bekins Moving & Storage Co., the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) decided to rule on the merits of an objection challenging a union's intention to equitably represent its members.

The company alleged that Local 390 of the Teamsters engaged in invidious discrimination regarding sex and Spanish-speaking and Spanish-surnamed persons, and, therefore, was disqualified from seeking an election. Further, the company argued that since the NLRB is an agency of the federal government, its authority is subject to limitations imposed by the Fifth Amendment and that it has a responsibility to administer the Taft-Hartley Act with regard to other statutes.

NLRB pointed out that the Fifth Amendment does not apply to individuals, but that it does forbid participation in and practice of invidious discrimination by the federal government. It said that to grant the benefits of certification to an organization which engages in and practices invidious discrimination would indicate sanctioning such actions by the federal government. Consequently, the majority of the NLRB decided that a precertification inquiry regarding the union's willingness and capacity to represent its members on an equal basis was appropriate and constitutional.

The dissenting opinion held that the NLRB does not have the authority to withhold certification from a union after it wins an election. The majority countered that the Supreme Court has constantly held that neither the federal government nor state governments may act to further discrimination, that NLRB lacks constitutional power to confer certification rather than statutory power to withhold it, and that other agencies, e.g., Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), which have power granted by Congress should enforce statutes. The majority then held that NLRB would determine, on a case-by-case basis, whether the nature and quantum of the proof would require NLRB to decline from certifying a labor organization.

A proposal to revoke certifications, where necessary, was offered by the dissenters, but the majority held that such action would only delay a determination of the issue, and, therefore, an inquiry would be made after the union won the election. The majority added that a post-election hearing would result in a report and recommendations by a hearing officer, affording the parties opportunity to file exceptions and briefs.

The majority of the NLRB concluded that the board lacked experience in this particular newly developing area of the law to codify its approach to the issues, but that the parties were entitled to judicial review of its determinations regarding the proper scope of NLRB's duty and authority to conform its law and procedures to the requirements of the Constitution and legislation against invidious discrimination. (Bekins Moving & Storage Co. of Florida, Inc. and Freight Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers, Local Union No. 390, an Affiliate of International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, National Labor Relations Board, June 11, 1974.)

COLORADO

Severability Clause Accountable for Court's Abstention on Compulsory Arbitration Issue

The City of Aurora brought suit seeking a determination which would set aside that portion of a proposed amendment to the city charter providing for collective bargaining and compulsory arbitration for fire fighters. The city had argued before a district court that the arbitration section was unconstitutional but was rebuffed. The Colorado Supreme Court sustained the lower court decision.

A critical factor in the court's decision was the severability clause contained in the amendment which provides that if any section of the amendment is declared invalid, the remainder of the amendment would not be affected.

The city contended that the amendment was invalid as the provisions for compulsory arbitration unconstitutionally delegated legislative authority, and on the assumption of constitutionality, it represented an unconstitutional delegation of power by reason of failure to prescribe standards.

The petitioners argued that the action was premature in that the electorate might reject the amendment, making the subject moot.

Since the courts lacked the power to rule upon a partial amendment before a referendum election, the court abstained from passing on the constitutionality of the issue. (City of Aurora v. Samuel J. Dilley, et al., Colorado Supreme Court, September 23, 1974.)

MASSACHUSETTS

Procedure for Enforcement of and Appeals from Orders of the State Labor Relations Commission Modified

Under an amendment to the Massachusetts State Labor Relations Act, when a petition is filed for the enforcement of an order of the State Labor Relations Commission respecting certification of a labor organization as exclusive bargaining representative which is based in part upon facts certified after an investigation, the certification and record of that investigation must be included in the transcript that accompanies the petition.

In addition, under the amendment, an order by a member or agent of the Commission in connection with a charge of unfair labor practice becomes final and binding, unless within 10 days after notice thereof, any party requests review by the full Commission. A review may be made upon a written statement by the Commission member or agent agreed to by the parties, or upon written statements furnished by the parties, or if any party or the Commission requests, upon a transcript of the testimony taken at the preliminary hearing.

However, under the amendment, there is no longer a deadline for an aggrieved party to file a petition with a superior court seeking to modify or set aside a final order of the Commission.

Fire Fighter Unit Designations Clarified

A recent amendment to the state public employee bargaining law has clarified the bargaining unit designations for uniformed fire fighters. The amendment to Section 3 of the Public Employee Bargaining Act gives the state Commission the authority to adopt rules, regulations, and procedures for unit determination and sets down the criteria the Commission is to follow in drawing up appropriate bargaining units, specifically fire fighter units.

The amendment excludes all personnel below the ranks of fire commissioner, fire commission and public safety directors, board of engineers, or chief of department from the ranks of professional, confidential, executive, administrative, and other managerial employees.

The section mandates that professional, confidential, executive, administrative, and other managerial personnel cannot be included in a unit of nonprofessional employees except by a majority vote of these professional personnel. (Massachusetts 47, 302 Section 2, Employee Rights.)

NEW JERSEY

Powers of Public Employment Relations Commission Extended

Recent ammendments to the New Jersey Employer-Employee Relations Act, which became effective January 19, 1975, exclude managerial and confidential employees of a public employer from the coverage of the Act, require public employers and employees to utilize existing contractual grievance procedures for setting disputes covered by the terms of a contract, extend the power of the Public Employment Relations Commission to issue complaints of unfair labor practices and to seek enforcement of its orders in state appellate courts, and require the Commission to extend the benefits of its training programs to public employees.

"Managerial executives" are defined as persons who "formulate" or are "charged with the responsibility of directing the effectuation" of management policies and practices. However, in school districts, only the superintendent or other chief administrator and the assistant superintendent are managerial executives. "Confidential employees" are defined as those "whose functional responsibilities or knowledge in connection with the issues involved in the collective negotiations process would make their membership in any appropriate negotiating unit incompatible with their official duties."

Public employees and employers are obligated to utilize grievance procedures established in a collective bargaining agreement for resolving any dispute which is covered by the terms of the agreement, regardless of any alternative procedures provided by statute.

The Act makes it an unfair labor practice for either an employer or employees to (a) interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights under the Act; (b) refuse to negotiate in good faith respecting terms and conditions of employment or to process a grievance; (c) refuse to reduce a negotiated agreement to writing or sign an agreement; (d) violate any rules or regulations established by the Commission.

The Commission has exclusive initial jurisdiction over charges of unfair labor practices. Upon receiving such a charge, the Commission or its agent may issue a complaint and schedule a hearing to receive evidence, following the procedures of the Administrative Procedure Act, provided that the charging party files a petition within six months of the day that an unfair labor practice allegedly occurred. If a party files a petition more than six months after the event, and can show that it was prevented from meeting the deadline, the deadline is extended to six months after the day when the obstacles to meeting the deadline were removed.

If after a hearing, the Commission confirms a charge of unfair labor practices, it shall order the guilty party to cease and desist and to take action necessary to comply with the Act. The Commission may apply to the state appellate courts to seek enforcement of its order. A court is obliged to confirm the Commission's findings of fact when they are based upon "substantial evidence on the record as a whole" and to grant enforcement of a Commission order which is "reasonably designed to effectuate the purposes of this Act."

The Commission has the power, upon request from either party, to determine whether a matter is within the scope of collective negotiations. Such determinations may be appealed to the state appellate courts.

The Commission may adopt rules necessary for regulating the conduct of representation elections, the time of commencement of negotiations and of the commencement of impasse procedures in order that disputes may be resolved before budget submission dates.

In addition to extending the powers of the Commission, the Act obligates the Commission to extend the benefits of technical advice and training programs in labor management relations which it offers in conjunction with the Institute of Management and Labor of Rutgers to public employees as well as employers.

TEXAS

AGO: Grievance May Be Heard But Not Rectified

The state attorney general ruled that under a state statute which gives public employees, who are not allowed to strike or engage in collective bargaining, the right to present grievances concerning wages, hours, and working conditions public employers are obligated to meet with them or representatives of their choosing, at reasonable times and places to hear grievances, although they are not legally required to redress them.

WASHINGTON

AGO: Prior Written Agreement Must Exist To Grant Retroactive Pay

Negotiated contracts which contain retroactive pay provisions for work performed before the effective date of a negotiated settlement are contingent upon the existence of a written agreement between the union and the public employer which states that pay received before the implementation of the agreement is not full pay for the services rendered.

The state attorney general addressed this opinion specifically to newly certified units which do not begin bargaining until after the date of certification, thereby necessitating such an agreement.

FEDERAL

Contractor May Not Invade Privacy To Prove Non-Discrimination

According to the Director of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance, a government contractor is not required to survey the ethnic or religious composition of his labor force to demonstrate routine compliance with federal regulations prohibiting discrimination in employment. Such a survey "may be appropriate" only if there are "indications of discrimination." In the absence of such indications, a contractor who demonstrates that he has taken "positive recruitment and outreach steps" as indicated in federal regulations (41 CFR 60-50.2(b)) will be deemed in compliance.

Leave For Pregnancy To Be Handled As Sick Leave

The Civil Service Commission in October 1974 issued new guidelines for federal employees concerning leaves related to pregnancy. Maternity leave has been abolished as a special category, and will be handled in accordance with the policies, regulations, and procedures governing sick leave. An employee requesting sick leave for maternity reasons is required to notify the agency of the reason for the leave, the approximate dates, and the expected duration. The length of absence will be determined by the employee, her physician, and her supervisor on an individual case basis. The agency is expected to permit the employee to continue working as long as she is not physically incapacitated.

In addition, the agency is expected to be aware of and seek medical advice on any particular working condition which might have harmful effects upon the employee or her unborn child, and to notify her of the medical opinion. "If the pregnant employee, after consulting her physician, asks for modification of her duties or a temporary reassignment to other available work for which she is qualified, every reasonable effort should be made to grant her request."

Following return from leave, the agency is expected to provide the employee with the same position or another position comparable to the one that she held before taking leave.

A male employee may request only annual leave or leave without pay to care for or assist his minor children or the mother of his newborn child while she is incapacitated. While each request "should be considered on its own merits," approval of leave for this reason is to be consistent with the agency's policy for granting leave in similar situations.

EEOC Requires Schools To Survey Racial Composition of Employees Annually

Equal Employment Opportunity Commission regulations require every public elementary and secondary school system, district, or any separately administered school with 15 or more employees, and every individual school regardless of size to annually survey its employees in order to gather racial/ethnic data for Elementary and Secondary Staff Information Report, EEO-5. This report is to provide the number of all employees, subject to local and state civil service regulations, employed during the current school year, by race/ethnic origin, sex, full-time and part-time, newly hired status, and occupation. The Commission recommends that the surveys be conducted visually by supervisors rather than by direct inquiry.

School systems, districts, and schools are required to retain the survey records for three years so that they may be available upon request to the School Reporting Committee. This Committee is a joint effort of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the Office of Civil Rights, and the Office of Education, which was established under authority provided in the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Equal Employment Opportunity Act of 1972, and the Education Amendment of 1972. In addition, systems, districts, and individual schools are required to retain records of decisions and actions to personnel for two years. When a charge of discrimination has been filed against a school by the EEOC or the Attorney General, or any individual, all relevant personnel records are to be retained until litigation is completed, in the case of an action, or in the case of a charge, until expiration of the statutory period within which action may be brought in a U.S. district court.

After an EEO-5 form is submitted, the data are distributed and published as follows: all the detailed data are available to EEOC and OCR; the data presented to OE do not include race and sex composition. While all three organizations will publish aggregate data by state or region, OE may publish data from school systems which do not indicate on the EEO-5 form that permission to publish is withheld; OCR may publish some data by school system and individual school; but EEOC is forbidden to publish any data other than aggregates. [Text of the rules and regulations appear on page 27.]

NLRB To Continue Jurisdiction over Private Elementary and Secondary Schools

The National Labor Relations Board decided not to adopt a proposed rule, announced in September 1974, which would have excluded private elementary and secondary schools from its jurisdiction. Standards for asserting NLRB jurisdiction set by case precedent will continue in effect, including the $1 million annual gross revenue guideline.

Factors cited in the proposed rule were the "insubstantial impact" on interstate commerce of employee disputes involving these types of schools, the high degree of state regulation and control over both proprietary and public schools, the inherently "local nature" of private school operations, and concern for maximum utilization of Board resources, since its caseload exceeded 42,000 cases in fiscal 1974.

The proposed rule reiterated the NLRB's position that its work and statutory mandate could best be achieved by limiting its jurisdiction to "enterprises whose operations have, or at which labor disputes would have, a pronounced impact upon the flow of interstate commerce."

Response to the proposed rule filed by parents organizations, state and national church groups, education associations, and labor representatives was split along traditional lines: employee advocates opposed declination of jurisdiction, while proprietary school operators and supportive groups approved it.

SPECIAL REPORTS

States Tighten Discrimination Laws in Accord with Federal and EEOC Guidelines

During the past year several states enacted new legislation or revised old statutes to more closely conform with federal regulatory law and or Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) guidelines which have the force of law in regard to hiring practices, contracting, and equal treatment of all minorities, regardless of race, sex, creed, or national origins. These statutes, guidelines, and state human relations commission rules and regulations are of import to local teacher associations as implementation of these laws and their effectuation are obligatory on both the employer and the employee organization.

These guidelines not only delineate prohibited practices for both the employer and the employee organization, but also describe the manner of compliance and recourse to redress of inequities.

The following is not intended as a comprehensive roundup of all state legislation on human rights; rather, it is a general update of changes in state legislation which came into effect in 1974. The accompanying table indicates the type of legislative action taken by several states and the areas covered.

Alaska: An amendment to the state anti-discrimination law (Title 18, Ch. 80), effective August 14, 1974, prohibits employment advertisements or inquiries which express or imply any limitation, specification, or preference as to sex, race, age, creed, color, or national origin.

Arizona: An amendment to the Civil Rights Act, effective May 3, 1974, revises the coverage of the Act, the specifications of unfair employment practices, and the powers of the Commission and repeals the law requiring contracts between public contractor and employers to contain an anti-discrimination clause.

With respect to employee coverage the amendment excludes from the Act all elected public officials of the state and its subdivisions and their appointees who are engaged in policy making and their personal staffs not subject to civil service laws. Indian tribes are excluded from coverage as employers.

With respect to unfair practices the amendment makes the following changes:

1. It prohibits an employer from discriminating in employment on grounds of religious practice or observances as well as belief unless the employer can show that accommodation to practices or observances would cause him undue hardship in the conduct of his business.
2. It repeals restrictions on employment advertisements by employers and employment agencies, but prohibits employment agencies and labor unions from making or refusing to make referrals on the basis of race, sex, color, religion, or national origin.
3. It permits employers to give and act upon professionally developed ability tests provided the test itself, its administration, and action based on it are not discriminatory.
4. It prohibits employers and labor organizations from discriminating in admission to apprenticeship and training programs conducted under their auspices.
5. While prohibiting employers and unions from limiting, segregating, or classifying employees in any way which tends to limit their opportunities or adversely affect their status because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, it permits employers to utilize merit or seniority systems which produce differential compensation or terms and conditions of employment unless those systems are discriminatory in intent.
6. It permits employers and labor organizations to discriminate against members of an organization required under federal law to register as communist.

The amendment empowers the Commission to cooperate and enter into agreements with all state, local, and federal agencies; to examine and copy all evidence relevant to a complaint being investigated; to subpoena witnesses and documents for its hearings; and to intervene in a civil action brought against any defendant except the state. The amendment also authorizes the courts to issue back pay awards which may be equal to back wages for two years before the issuance of a complaint minus interim earnings or amounts earnable with reasonable diligence by the employee.

California: An amendment to the Fair Employment Practices Act, effective July 1, 1974, prohibits discrimination in employment against the physically handicapped, including those suffering any impairment which requires special education or remedial services, but permits an employer to refuse to hire an applicant whose physical handicap renders him unable to perform the job or to perform it without endangering the health and safety of himself or others.

In addition, the Fair Employment Practice Commission has issued sex discrimination guidelines, effective November 7, 1974. Under these guidelines, discrimination based on sex is lawful only when sex is a bona fide occupational qualification essential to the normal operation of the employer's business if the employer can prove that it is impossible for a man (or a woman) to perform a specific job.

In order to publish a help-wanted advertisement which expresses a preference based upon sex, an employer must obtain the approval of the Commission in writing, show it to the newspaper requested to publish the ad, and keep it available for public inspection. Written approval by the Commission must also be submitted by the employer to employment agencies which are requested to process job orders based upon sex.

The standards of all job qualifications and tests used by the employer must be evaluated by the employer to determine if there is an adverse effect on members of one sex. If such an effect exists, the test must be validated in accord with the Commission guidelines on employment selection procedure.

Employment agencies are prohibited from (a) processing job orders based on sex without the written approval of the Commission, (b) referring or refusing to refer on grounds of sex, (c) maintaining separate application forms or separate files for male and female jobs or applicants. In addition, an employment agency is prohibited from dealing in one sex, unless sex is a bona fide occupational qualification for the jobs it fills.

Discrimination in hiring or fringe benefits on grounds of sex, marital status, presence of dependents, head of household status, or pregnancy is prohibited. Employers are also prohibited from making job classifications or departmental assignments on the basis of sex, and unions are prohibited from negotiating a collective bargaining agreement in which jobs are classified by sex. The guidelines also prohibit systems of seniority or progression based upon sex or upon a distinction between light and heavy jobs unless that distinction can be justified in terms of employment injuries or physical limitations. Equal pay and job status must be given to women and men who perform jobs requiring equal skill, effort, and responsibility, and both sexes must have equal access to all training programs and promotion opportunities.

Finally, irrespective of marital status, it is an unfair labor practice to discharge a woman or penalize her with respect to terms and conditions of employment because she requires leave as a result of a temporary disability owing to pregnancy, childbirth, or recovery therefrom. If a regular leave policy exists, conditions of leave must be those applicable to other leaves under that policy. However, irrespective of the presence or absence of a regular leave policy an employer must grant a "reasonable" period of leave for temporary disabilities resulting from pregnancy or childbirth, and upon return from maternity leave, employees must be reinstated without loss of status, pay, or seniority.

If an employer has no leave policy, an exception to these requirements will be made only if the employer can prove that "business necessity or financial hardship will place an undue burden on the employer."

Connecticut: An amendment to the Governor's Code of Fair Practices, effective October 1, 1974, requires state contracts to contain a clause in which the contractor agrees not to discriminate on grounds of sex or physical disability, unless he can show that a physical disability prevents the performance of the work involved. The contractor must agree to provide the Civil Rights Commission with the information relating to his employment practices and procedures under the contract.

Hawaii: An amendment to the Hawaii Fair Employment Practices Act, effective June 10, 1974, prohibits employers from refusing to hire, employ, or discharge an individual on the basis of a conviction for an offense which does not have a substantial relationship to the functions and responsibilities of the job which the individual is seeking or is currently employed in.

Iowa: An amendment to the Civil Rights Act, effective July 1, 1974, empowers the Civil Rights Commission to subpoena books or papers which are relevant to a complaint and permits the Commission to issue temporary injunctions when it appears that a complainant may suffer irreparable injury as a result of an alleged violation of the Act. Permission to issue injunctions expires July 1, 1975.

Kansas: An amendment to the Act Against Discrimination, effective upon publication in 1974, prohibits discrimination in employment against the physically handicapped, if the handicap is not related to the person's ability to perform a particular job. However, no employer is required to construct any special facilities or fixtures in order to comply with the Act.

Kentucky: An amendment to the Fair Employment Practices Act, effective 90 days after legislative adjournment in 1974, prohibits an employer from discriminating in employment on grounds of religious practice or observances as well as belief, unless he can show that accommodation to practices or observances would cause him undue hardship in the conduct of his business.

Maine: An amendment to the Human Rights Act, effective 90 days after legislative adjournment in 1974, prohibits discrimination in employment against the physically handicapped unless the handicap prevents the prospective employee from getting to work, performing duties or performing them without endangering the health and safety of the employee or others. In addition, an employer is prohibited from requesting applicants or employment agencies to supply information on physical handicaps unless the application is necessary for a "suitable job referral."

After September 1, 1974, all places of work which are newly built and older buildings which are expanded or remodeled at a cost exceeding $100,000 must make special provisions to allow the employment of the handicapped.

Maryland: An amendment to the Fair Employment Practices Act, effective July 1, 1974, prohibits discrimination in employment on grounds of marital status or physical or mental handicap, including retardation if the handicap does not reasonably preclude the performance of duties.

Massachusetts: An amendment to the Fair Employment Practices Law, effective January 15, 1974, prohibits employers from requiring employees to violate or forgo religious observances, including the Sabbath and religious holidays. Employers are also required to make any reasonable accommodation to the religious needs of employees or prospective employees which will not cause undue hardship in the conduct of his business. Undue hardship is defined as inability to provide services required by state or federal law, endangering the health and safety of employees, an emergency, a situation where the orderly transaction of business cannot be carried out by having the absent employee replaced by another similarly qualified employee.

Minnesota: An amendment to the Human Rights Act, effective August 1, 1974, requires bidders for public contracts to apply to the Commissioner of Human Rights for a certificate of compliance with the Act which forbids discrimination in employment on the basis of race, religion, national origin, sex, marital status, and status with regard to public assistance or disability. However, no state contract which was awarded before the denial, suspension, or revocation of a certificate may be terminated or abridged.

In addition, the Department of Human Rights has issued Guidelines for Eliminating Sex Discrimination, which became effective on July 8, 1974. Under these guidelines, sex is a bona fide occupational qualification only where it is required for authenticity or genuineness, as in the case of models, or where public morals require one sex to perform a particular job, as in the case of males being required as attendants in men's washrooms. Tradition, stereotypes concerning the capabilities of men or women in general, preferences of workers, clients, or customers, or the employer's need to provide separate restrooms, are not bona fide occupational qualifications.

In the absence of a bona fide occupational qualification, employment advertisements indicating a preference, limitation, or specification based upon sex are unlawful. The use of masculine gender without the use of the feminine in a help-wanted ad is an indication of preference. Sexually separated help-wanted columns in newspapers are unlawful.

In the absence of a bona fide occupational qualification, employment agencies which deal in one sex or which knowingly fill a job order based upon a sexual preference are engaging in unfair employment practices. Agencies which fill job orders based upon sexual preferences must notify the Department of Human Rights of the employer's request and the basis of the employer's claim that sex is a bona fide occupational qualification, in order to avoid liability for violating the Human Rights Act.

In the absence of a bona fide occupational qualification, separate lines of seniority or progression are unlawful if members of one sex are adversely affected.

Discrimination in hiring or in the provision of fringe benefits on the grounds of sex, marital status, head of household status, or number of dependents, is prohibited, and an employer is required to hire pregnant female applicants unless "he can show that it is not reasonable to do so." Employers are required to take affirmative action to hire women for jobs from which they have been previously excluded.

In addition, sick leave plans or temporary disability insurance plans maintained by employers must cover disabilities caused by pregnancy, miscarriage, abortion, childbirth, and recovery therefrom as temporary disabilities. Irrespective of the presence or absence of a sick leave plan, an employer must grant a pregnant employee up to five months' maternity leave, and upon her return, the employer must reinstate her to a position equal in pay, status, and seniority to the one she left. An employer may require medical certification of fitness to work. Termination of an employee based upon pregnancy is prohibited.

Montana: An amendment to the Fair Employment Practices Act, effective July 1, 1974, amplifies the provisions of the Act and creates a Commission for Human Rights to enforce the revised statute. The Act as revised bars discrimination in advertising, hiring, terms and conditions of employment, admission to union membership, and training and apprenticeship programs by employers, labor organizations, and employment agencies on the grounds of sex, age, physical or mental handicap, race, creed, color, or national origin unless based on a bona fide occupational qualification.

With the exception of policy-making positions on the immediate staff of public officials, the law prohibits discrimination on grounds of political beliefs.

Private and public educational institutions are prohibited from discriminating in admissions. Employers, labor organizations, and employment agencies are required to maintain records on age, sex, and race required for the administration of federal and state laws.

The statute creates a Commission for Human Rights to consist of five members appointed by the governor which will operate under the Department of Industry and Labor. Complaints by individuals are to be sent to the Department and reviewed by the Commission which will meet four times a year. The Commission may request a district court to issue a temporary cease and desist order lasting 14 days. The department will investigate and attempt to settle disputes in an informal manner. If the department's efforts fail, the Commission will hold a formal hearing. Upon a finding of discrimination, the Commission will hold a formal hearing. Upon finding of discrimination, the Commission may issue a restraining order and require affirmative action, including "rectification of pecuniary harm." However, the Commission may not award "punitive damages." The Commission may also request a court to issue an injunction to enforce its orders.

New York: An amendment to the state Human Rights Law, effective September 1, 1974, prohibits discrimination in employment against individuals with any physical, mental, or medical disability which is not related to their ability to engage in activities involved in the job or occupation in which they are employed or are seeking employment. Employers, labor unions, and employment agencies are forbidden to discriminate on grounds of disability with respect to advertising, filling job orders, hiring, union membership, terms and conditions of employment, admission to apprenticeship, or on-the-job training programs or discharge.

Ohio: The Civil Rights Commission issued guidelines on "goals and timetables" for affirmative action, effective July 23, 1974. Under these guidelines, an appropriate goal for an employer with a history of past discrimination is to bring the proportion of minority and female employees up to the level of minorities and females in the general population of the employer's labor area as defined by the SMSA, or in the case of professional and managerial positions, up to the level indicated by the general availability of minority group members with the requisite qualifications.

The degree of appropriateness of this goal is affected by the following: (a) unemployment among minorities and women in the labor area, (b) the availability of minority and female workers with the requisite skills, (c) the presence in the facility of minority or female employees who may be promoted or trained, (d) the capacity of an employer to train on the job, (e) the presence of accessible training institutions, (f) the presence of a significant hiring or promotion rate owing to employee turnover or growth of the employee population, and (g) the ability of the employer to recruit outside the labor area. With respect to setting time tables, relevant factors involved include expected expansion and contraction of and turnover among the employee population.

If a plan is adopted involuntarily as a result of a complaint of discrimination, regular reporting to the Commission is a necessary part of the goals and timetables. An employer who wishes to be considered in compliance with the FEPL must demonstrate a good faith effort.

Rhode Island: In January 1974, the governor issued an executive order revising the "Governor's Code of Fair Practices," which establishes equal opportunity and affirmative action as the policy of all units of the state government. In addition, the Commission for Human Rights issued sex discrimination guidelines.

The Code as revised, prohibits discrimination in hiring, promotion, and provision of services against any person on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, age, national origin, or physical handicap by departments of the state government, private employers using state agencies providing employment, referral, or placement services, educational counseling, and vocational guidance, and on-the-job training programs which state agencies conduct or participate in, private businesses, educational institutions, or health care facilities licensed or chartered by the state, and public contractors on any contract which exceeds $20,000.

In addition to prohibiting discrimination, the Code requires all departments of the state government, public contractors, and private educational institutions licensed or chartered by the state to take affirmative action. Within the state government, "each appointing authority" is expected to draw up and submit an affirmative action plan and annual reports showing the allocation of funds for on-the-job training, the parity of civil service classes doing similar work, and the training of supervisory personnel in "equal opportunity" principles and procedures. In addition, the "Division of Personnel" or the civil service is required to "take positive steps to insure that the entire examination and testing process. . . is from conscious or inadvertent bias." Public contractors are required to submit affirmative action plans similar to those submitted by federal contractors under Federal Executive Orders 11216 and 11375.

The Code provides for enforcement, with respect to the private sector, through the state agencies which charter, license, grant contracts, financial assistance, or services to segments of the private sector, and the Rhode Island Commission for Human Rights. The agencies are expected to draw up for their particular clients compliance regulations, which are to be reviewed by the Commission for Human Rights and approved by the governor. These regulations may include requirements for submission of data, other monitoring procedures, and penalties. Under these regulations, the ultimate penalty for noncompliance is to be forfeiture of state contracts, grants of assistance, licenses and charters, and services. State agencies which have the authority to grant and revoke charters are expected to "actively use their authority."

In addition, state agencies are expected to monitor their clients. Public contractors are expected to submit to the State Purchasing Agent compliance reports similar to those submitted by federal contractors under Federal Executive Orders 11216 and 11375. The Department of Health is expected to make periodic reports to the Commission for Human Rights at times specified by the Commission. State employment services are to notify the Commission promptly of any employers, employment agencies, or unions suspected of practicing unlawful discrimination. Private educational institutions are required to "show compliance" at the request of the Board of Regents or the Commission for Human Rights.

However, the affirmative action plans prepared by public contractors are to be submitted for review by the Commission and approval by the governor.

In the public sector, nondiscrimination and affirmative action in hiring, promotion, and provision of services by state agencies are to be enforced by the Commission for Human Rights and a State Equal Employment officer, who is to be selected by the governor and is to work under the Director of Administration.

With respect to nondiscrimination, the Commission is authorized to make rules and regulations to obtain compliance and to establish penalties for noncompliance, with the approval of the governor. Monitoring is partly provided for in the form of monthly reports on hiring and promotion to be submitted by each agency to the State Equal Employment Officer. In addition, the Commission for Human Relations is authorized, at its own initiative, or upon a complaint, to bring charges of discrimination against state agencies or their personnel. The Commission may order the discontinuance of any agency practice or "pattern" which it considers to be discriminatory in intent and seek court enforcement of its order.

Affirmative action plans are to be drawn up within the agencies, in accordance with criteria established by the Commission for Human Rights, and to be submitted within the deadlines established by the State Equal Employment Officer. The annual budget submissions of each agency are expected to contain results and targets for implementing affirmative action. All affirmative action plans are to be submitted to the State Equal Employment Officer and may be subject to review by the Commission. If the officer disapproves of a plan, it must be redrawn in accordance with the criteria of the Commission. Final approval of all plans is made by the governor.

The Commission for Human Rights is authorized to initiate complaints against state agencies and their personnel who fail to comply with the requirements of an affirmative action plan.

Under the new guidelines on sex discrimination issued by the Rhode Island Commission for Human Rights sex is a "bona fide occupational qualification where it is necessary for the purpose of authenticity or genuineness, e.g., as actor or actress; or where community standards not otherwise inconsistent with the Fair Employment Practices Act demand that a person of a particular sex be selected, e.g., a male to be men's washroom attendant, a woman to be a fitter in a lingerie establishment."

However, sex is not a bona fide occupational qualification where it is based on the preferences of employers, customers, clients, etc., or where it is based on stereotyped assumptions about the capacities of women or men in general as workers. Individuals are to be considered by employers on the basis of their individual capacities.

Where sex is not a bona fide occupational qualification, the following are unlawful employment practices: (a) classifying jobs as male or female, directly or in disguised form such as "light" or "heavy," with separate lines of progression or seniority; (b) unequal pay for substantially, but not necessarily 100 percent similar work; (c) help wanted advertisements or pre-employment inquiries which express any "preferences, limitations, specification, or discrimination" based upon sex; (d) discrimination between employees on grounds of sex, marital status, or head of household status; and (e) discrimination with regard to fringe benefits or retirement age.

While requests for leave and insurance payments for disabilities connected with pregnancy or childbirth are to be treated on the same terms as other temporary disabilities, in accord with written and unwritten policies governing sick leave, the termination of an employee under such policies is unlawful where available leave is inadequate and there is a "disparate inpact on employees of one sex" and the policies are not justified by "business necessity."

Finally, "any policy of maternity leave shall be based upon individual capacities or characteristics. . . . An employer may require that the employee produce medical certification that she is physically able to continue work, while pregnant, and that she is physically able to resume her work, after childbirth."

South Dakota: The Commission on Human Rights adopted rules of practice and procedure, effective June 10, 1974, which contain guidelines for implementing the employment aspects of the Human Relations Act of 1972 which bans discrimination in employment on the basis of race, color, creed, religion, sex, national origin, or ancestry. These guidelines pertain to hiring, discharge, the use of employment tests, and discrimination on the basis of sex, religion, national origin, and ancestry.

With regard to hiring, the guidelines stipulate that an employer must assure that all potential applicants are given fair notice of vacancies, have an equal opportunity to apply, and are considered on nondiscriminatory grounds. With regard to discharge, the guidelines stipulate that the Commission will consider an employer in violation of the Act if discrimination constitutes part of and not necessarily the entire reason for discharging an employee.

With regard to employment testing, the guidelines stipulate that the use of a test which adversely affects any class of persons protected by the Act constitutes discrimination, unless the test has been validated along the guidelines of the EEOC, issued on July 21, 1970, and the employer can demonstrate that no alternative procedures are available. While employers may use an unvalidated test if there is substantial evidence of its validity and validation procedures required by EEOC are in progress, employment agencies are barred from making referrals or appraisals on the basis of such a test. If a test is validated, employers must provide opportunities for retest and reconsideration to employees who, after failing the test, avail themselves of more training and experience. In addition, a validated test may not be imposed on employees or applicants who have been subject to past discrimination when neither they nor other employees were previously subjected to it.

With respect to sex, the guidelines stipulate that sex is a bona fide occupational qualification where it is necessary for "authenticity and genuineness." Qualifications based on preferences of employers, employees, or customers, or on sexual stereotypes are not bona fide. In the absence of a bona fide occupational qualification, the Act prohibits sex as a basis for separate lines of progression and seniority, help-wanted ads, the filling of job orders by employment agencies, and employment agencies dealing only with one sex. In addition, the guidelines prohibit discrimination in fringe benefits which is based on sex, marital status, or head of household status. Finally, where the Occupational Safety and Health Act requires the existence of separate restrooms for each sex, refusal to hire in order to avoid this provision is an unlawful employment practice.

With respect to religion, an employer is required to make a reasonable accommodation to the religious needs of employees and prospective employees, unless the employer can demonstrate that a reasonable accommodation would cause an undue hardship in the conduct of his business.

With respect to national origin, the guidelines prohibit the employers from using tests written in English where skill in English is not required for a job and is not the mother tongue of the employee or applicant. They also prohibit denying equal opportunity on the grounds that an employee is married to or has otherwise associated with persons of a specific national origin via attendance in schools and churches or affiliation with lawful organizations. With respect to ancestry, the guidelines prohibit discrimination against persons who do not meet national norms for height and weight where meeting those norms is not necessary for the performance of the work involved.

Tennessee: The Equal Pay Law, effective July 1, 1974, prohibits discrimination in the payment of wages or salaries based upon sex for jobs involving comparable skill, effort, and responsibility, unless the differentials are based upon a nondiscriminatory seniority system or measures of the quality and quantity of output. To enforce the Act, the Commissioner of Labor is empowered to issue regulations, resolve disputes by persuasion and conciliation, or institute a suit on behalf of an aggrieved employee. The courts are empowered to award an employee both back pay and damages.

Vermont: A new law, effective July 1, 1974, bars "unreasonable" discrimination against the physically handicapped, either in employment or in union membership. The statute provides for enforcement through civil suits.

Virginia: A new Equal Pay Law, effective July 1, 1974, prohibits employers from discriminating in the payment of wages or salary based upon sex for jobs of comparable skill, effort, and responsibility unless the differentials are based upon a nondiscriminatory seniority system or measures of the quantity or quality of output. The statute provides for enforcement through civil suits, and the courts are permitted to award an amount equal to back pay plus twice the amount of wages withheld.

Washington: The Human Rights Commission has issued new guidelines and regulations, effective June 21, 1974, with respect to pre-employment inquiries, bona fide occupational qualifications, and affirmative action under the Law Against Discrimination which prohibits discrimination in employment on the basis of age, sex, race, color, creed, national origin, or physical handicap.

With respect to pre-employment inquiries the guidelines stipulate what is permitted and what is prohibited as follows:

1. While an employer may request employees to provide a birth certificate or state their true age, inquiries implying a preference for a person under age 40 are prohibited.
2. While proof of citizenship may be required after hiring, any demand for proof before hiring or any inquiry which would divulge national origin is prohibited.
3. While inquiries into the existence of obstacles for meeting job attendance or scheduling are permitted, inquiries concerning a spouse, spouse's employment, salary, or child care arrangements are prohibited.
4. While inquiries into the existence of job-related handicaps are permitted, inquiries into general existence of handicaps, or height and weight are prohibited unless based on actual job requirements.

5. All inquiries into arrests, and any inquiry into a conviction which occurred seven years before the job application are prohibited.
6. Any inquiries into the applicant's original name if it was changed by court order or marriage are prohibited.
7. Inquiries into national origin other than ability to speak foreign languages where that ability is a job requirement are prohibited.
8. Any requirement to list organizational memberships which indicate sex, marital status, race, color, religion, or national origin is prohibited. All questions relating to race, sex, pregnancy, and religion and inquiries concerning the names of relatives not employed by the company are prohibited.
9. Requests for photographs are prohibited.

Inquiries or requests that an applicant specify race, etc., must be accompanied by statements indicating why race, etc., is a bona fide occupational qualification. In the absence of a rationale, the inquiry is evidence of an unfair employment practice.

With respect to "bona fide occupational qualification," the regulations stipulate that race, creed, color, national origin, age, sex, and marital status are bona fide occupational qualifications where they are (a) essential to the accomplishment of the purpose for which the person is hired, e.g., integrating a school, or social work with an ethnic group where a group member is necessary, and (b) needed to correct past discrimination. However, an employer may inquire into an applicant's race, color, sex, religion, marital status or national origin when direct inquiry is mandated by federal law and there is no other practical way to obtain data for a nondiscriminatory purpose. Records of such inquiries are to be kept separate from personnel files and reserved for use by top management in meeting the reporting requirements of the Human Rights Commission. No past employment records may be kept.

Inquiries which are based on an affirmative action plan must indicate that the plan was approved by the Human Rights Commission. The new guidelines stipulate that affirmative action plans should be put into effect by an employer wherever a class of employees is not represented in the employee population in proportion to its representation in the community. Unions and employers are expected to determine what, if any, practices of theirs are resulting in under-representation of a particular group and to make changes accordingly. While other groups cannot be excluded from consideration in hiring, and cannot be laid off in order to implement a plan, it is permissible to give weight to a class of applicants which is under-represented in the employee population. Permissible components of such plans include (a) the ascertaining of data regarding the race, etc., of applicants and the use of such data for selection and referral, (b) maintaining these data in separate files for recruitment when jobs are available, and (c) special rules for the retention of protected groups in case of layoffs.

Wisconsin: An amendment to the Fair Employment Act, effective June 16, 1974, gives the Department of Industry, Labor and Human Relations the power to make back pay awards upon a finding of discrimination. An employer's liability extends back two years from the filing of the complaint by the employee. Interim earnings or an amount earnable with reasonable diligence on the part of the employee operate to reduce the award, while relief payments made to the employee by unemployment or welfare agencies are to be deducted from the award and returned to the agencies.

CLASS SIZE

The parties recognize that the availability of optimum school facilities for both student and teacher is desirable to insure the high quality of education that is the goal of both teacher and Board. It is acknowledged that the primary duty and responsibility of the teacher is to help students learn and that the organization of the school day should be directed at insuring that the energy of the teacher is primarily utilized to this end,

At no time shall a class exceed the reasonable physical limits of the classroom, lab facility or number of work stations available and equipped for students.

Any traditional elementary class enrolling students in excess of the total number allowed for the grade in question shall be reimbursed by the Board at the rate of $1.00 per child, per attendance day.

A secondary class enrolling students in excess of the number of students allowed shall be reimbursed by the Board at the rate of twenty (20) cents per child, per class hour, that is, each class period a students name is carried on the roll for that class.

A departmentalized elementary class enrolling students in excess of the number of students allowed shall be reimbursed by the Board at the rate of twenty-five (25) cents per block of time, that is, each block of time a student's name is carried on the roll for that period. The first block of time shall be the period from commencement of school in the a.m. until the normal recess time; the second block of time shall be from the a.m. recess until noon; the third block of time shall be from commencement of the p.m. session until the normal recess period, the fourth block of time shall be from the recess period until the end of the p.m. session.

Deviations from these blocks of time may be worked out on a building level by those teachers affected, and if concensus is reached, overload reimbursement may be made to accomodate a different schedule. It is recognized by the parties that reimbursement shall not exceed the one ($1.) dollar per student overload per day.

Split classes are not to exceed twenty (20) pupils per class. Split classes are organized by scheduling students from two traditional grades.

The parties in recognition of the concept of family grouping as is sometimes used in an individualized program, e.g., The Westinghouse PLAN program, hereby agree that a building may establish classes consisting of family groups. A family group is a structured combination of students of varying abilities and ages and shall qualify for either additional aid service: or for excess membership reimbursement as cited. The average years beyond kindergarten for the group shall be used to determine the grade level which applies toward reimbursement or aide services.

A building principal shall have consultation with the building faculty members to allow teacher input prior to making his final decision for a building grouping plan.

Reimbursement for excess membership under the terms of this Article shall be made subsequent to the end of each semester. The excess membership count shall start with the beginning of the third (3rd) week of school. The time from the opening of school until the third (3rd) week shall be a period for the building principal to confer with teachers and make class or room adjustments.

A maximum of $30,000 for excess membership, and $10,000, for aides will be budgeted for reimbursement of excess membership under this Article. Funds budgeted for reimbursement of excess membership may be allocated for additional aide service in an amount not to exceed that which the teacher would have received for excess membership. From the $40,000, will be paid any claims against the amount of excess membership during the first semester of the school year, and the residue will be prorated, if necessary, for any amount due and payable for the second semester's operation.

Paraprofessional services will be available to classroom teachers with excess membership (in lieu of reimbursement) according to the following guidelines:

In the event a teacher does not receive the services of a paraprofessional: for a five (5) consecutive day period the teacher shall receive excess membership reimbursement from the first day of the loss of services of the paraprofessional, and shall receive excess membership reimbursement for the remainder of the school year or until another paraprofessional is secured.

Elementary classrooms

1/4th of school day	2 students of excess membership
1/2 of school day	4 students of excess membership
3/4ths of school day	6 students of excess membership
Full school day	8 students of excess membership

Paraprofessional services, in lieu of excess membership reimbursement, could become an option for a secondary teacher, and departmentalized elementary teachers, during the tenure of this contract upon approval of a formula by the preview and evaluation committee.

In-service programs will be provided by the Board to assist teachers in utilizing paraprofessionals and for paraprofessional training.

PERSONNEL: Grievance procedure ends with final and binding arbitration; the teacher may review his/her own file and have a representative of the Association accompany him/her; privileged information specifically exempted from review will include confidential credentials and related personal references normally sought at the time of employment; the reimbursement for college courses will not exceed $30 per semester hour or $20 per term hour, or the maximum current rate being charged by a state college or university; reimbursement will be made only for courses at the graduate level and for 25 semester hours applied toward the M.A. or for a maximum of 15 semester hours taken after the master's degree; probationary teachers will be evaluated at least 3 times during the school year.

TENURE PROCEDURE

The building principal will appoint a sponsor from within the building for each probationary teacher. If possible the sponsoring teacher should teach the same subject area or the same grade level as the probationary teacher. The sponsor will serve in an advisory capacity only.

At the request of either the probationary teacher or the sponsor, a new sponsor may be appointed by the principal.

The sponsor is to aid the probationary teacher in becoming familiar with the building procedures, acquainting him with adult personnel in the building in which he is teaching and offer aid whenever possible in helping the teacher adjust to his teaching assignment.

Teachers whose services are being considered for termination under provisions of the Tenure Act shall receive a registered or certified letter of notification and statement of charges from the Superintendent and be advised of their rights under the Tenure Act for a hearing and appeal. Teachers who are so notified may be suspended with pay pending a final determination by the Board after completing a hearing as provided in the Tenure Act.

Criteria and evaluation of work performance of probationary teachers will be in writing; the observation period will be no less than 45 minutes; all teachers will be notified of pending staff vacancies and new positions and will have 10 days to apply; the board will facilitate the assignment process by providing for the transfer of teachers between buildings; a written request will be submitted, indicating transfer locations, with notification of the decision within 15 days after the request;

STUDENT DISCIPLINE

Corporal Punishment: It is axiomatic that the best learning takes place in the best learning situation. The best learning situation is found where the teacher, student and parent are working cooperatively. This condition is augmented by a physical environment that is pleasant, neat and clean and in harmony with the general learning situation. All students are expected to show appropriate respect to the teacher and in like manner the school and all teachers are expected to deal with their students in a manner that is wholly professional. In the event of student misconduct or non-conformance with school rules, a conference will be held with the parents of the student and evaluation summaries of the conference filed with the student's record. Persistent student misconduct or persistent non-conformance with school rules constitutes sufficient reason for the Superintendent to recommend to the Board that the student be expelled.

The laws of the state of Michigan generally follow the doctrine of "loco parentis" in matters of teacher-pupil relationships, in other words, the teacher stands in the place of the parent in school behavior questions. This doctrine generally gives the teacher the legal right to administer reasonable corporal punishment. If it does seem that corporal punishment is the only remaining solution to a problem of persistent student misconduct or disobedience, please observe the following questions before administering same:

- Wil this accomplish the purpose intended?
- Are you correct in your actions?
- Are you acting in good faith and in a thoroughly professional manner?
- Can I secure an adult witness?

If the above questions can be answered to the personal satisfactions of the teacher or principal concerned and it is then deemed advisable to administer corporal punishment the following guide lines should be observed:

- Punishment should not be administered in anger.
- There should be an adult witness present.
- The punishment should occur in a location other than the classroom preferably the principal's office.
- Punishment should be limited to "spanking" using the hand or appropriate instrument on the fleshy part of the buttocks.
- Students should not be slapped about the face or ears, subjected to ear pulling, hair pulling, or striking with ruler, book or other ariticle.

In cases of self-defense, the teacher has a right to defend himself.

ACADEMIC FREEDOM

Controversial Issues: Training for effective citizenship in a democracy is accepted as one of the major purposes of the Wyoming Public Schools. The instructional program established to achieve this purpose demands free discussion of issues including discussion of those issues that may be considered controversial. Free discussion of controversial issues is the heart of the democratic process. Freedom of speech and the free access to information are among our most cherished American traditions. For the Wyoming Public Schools the policy on controversial issues is defined in terms of the rights of pupils rather than in the terms of the rights of teachers. In the study of controversial issues in our schools the pupil has four (4) rights to be recognized:

- The right to study any controversial issue which has political, economic, or social significance and concerning which, at the student's level of maturity, he should begin to have an opinion.
- The right to have free access to all relevant information, particularly those materials that circulate freely in the community.
- The right to provide competent instruction in an atmosphere free from bias, prejudice, and external pressures.
- The right to form and express his own opinions on controversial issues without thereby jeopardizing his relations with his teachers or the school.

The study of controversial issues is objective and scholarly with a minimum emphasis on opinion. The teacher should approach controversial issues in the classroom in an impartial and unprejudiced manner and must refrain from using his classroom privileges and prestige to promote a partisan point of view. Good teaching of subjects containing controversial issues requires more skill than most other kinds of teaching and, so far as possible, only teachers of broad experience and superior ability are to be assigned subjects in which a large body of the material involves controversy.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR FILING EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION ELEMENTARY-SECONDARY STAFF INFORMATION REPORT EEO-5

Federal law requires that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) and the Office for Civil Rights (OCR) of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) prescribe such records and reports as are necessary for the enforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Accordingly this report is required by the OCR to carry out the purposes of Title VI of the Act and by EEOC to carry out the purposes of Title VII as amended by the Equal Employment Opportunity Act of 1972.

This compliance reporting system is being implemented by the School Reporting Committee (EEO-5) in a joint effort between EEOC, OCR and the National Center for Educational Statistics of the Office of Education (HEW) for the collection of employment data of public elementary and secondary school systems or districts and schools. The applicable laws, and regulations issued respectively by the EEOC and OCR pursuant to such laws are reprinted in section 4 of the Appendix. The bases for the requirement of these data by the Office of Education are also explained in that section of the Appendix.

1. RECORD-KEEPING AND FILING REQUIREMENTS.

Every public elementary and secondary school system or district, including every individually or separately administered district within a system, and every separately administered school, with 15 or more employees, and every individual school regardless of its size, within such system or district, is required to make or keep all records necessary for completing and filing the report EEO-5, whether or not it is required to file the report in any particular year.

The School Reporting Committee will determine each year which of these systems, districts, and schools will be required to file report EEO-5, and will notify them of that fact when it mails them the forms.

2. WHEN TO FILE.

Employment statistics should cover the payroll period closest to October 1 of the reporting year and the reports should be filed no later than October 15, 1974.

3. WHERE TO FILE.

The completed reports should be forwarded to the P.O. Box indicated on the form. All requests for additional report forms should also be directed to this address.

4. HOW TO FILE.

A report must be filed covering the employment data of all the administrative and other functions of the system and the combined employment data of all the schools within the system regardless of the employment size of individual schools. A report must also be filed for each elementary or secondary school within the system or district.

Forms will be sent directly to the school system or may be transmitted to the system through the State Education Agency. In those jurisdictions where all the data are available at a single location, reports for individual schools and the aggregate report for the system or district may be completed and certified by the central office. Where data are not available at a single location, reports should be obtained by the central office from individual schools. In such cases certification will be made by a school official.

5. REQUESTS FOR INFORMATION AND SPECIAL PROCEDURES

A school, school system or district which believes that preparation or the filing of report EEO-5 would create an undue hardship may apply to the Commission for a special reporting procedure, submitting a written alternative proposal for compiling and reporting the required information. Only those special procedures approved in writing by the Commission are authorized. Such authorization will remain in effect until notification of cancellation is given.

Direct all requests for special reporting procedures and other information to: School Reporting Committee, EEO-5—Attention: Office of Research, 1800 G Street, N.W. Washington, D.C. 20506.

6. INSTRUCTIONS FOR FILING EEO-5

A. TYPE OF REPORT

Check whether the report is for a school system, an individual school, or another type of educational agency. Specify type of agency if other than system or school. If it is for a separate school facility or for an annex, specify next to "Other."

(1) School System or School District Report

The report for the school system must provide summary data for all personnel employed by the school system either full-time or part-time, regardless of the location of the person's assignment to a school or other unit of the school system. Full-time personnel must be reported in Part II-A of the report; part-time personnel are to be reported in Part II-B. It is important to note that if a person is employed on a full-time basis by the school system, but assigned to one or more schools on a part-time basis in each, that person must be reported as a full-time employee on the school system report but as a part-time person on the school report. Anyone employed part-time and assigned part-time to a school must be reported as part-time on both the school system and school reports where he or she is assigned.

(2) School Report

A report must be filed for each school and each classroom facility if in a separate location from the school operated by the school system. See definition of "School" in section 1 of the Appendix.

Persons assigned full-time to the school must be reported in Part II-A of the matrix. Persons assigned part-time to the school, regardless of whether they are employed full-time by the school system, must be reported in Part II-B of the matrix.

B. DATA TO BE REPORTED

Part I—IDENTIFICATION INFORMATION

A. Type of Agency Which Operates the Reporting School System or School.

Check the agency which operates the reporting unit (School System or School) and which has the responsibility or ultimate authority for the employment or dismissal of a member or members of the staff.

B. School System Identification

Enter the school system name and address whether the report is for the system as a whole (the aggregate report) or it is for an individual school or for a separate classroom facility. In addition enter the number of schools operated by the system. Do not count a separate classroom facility or annex as a school in reporting the number of schools.

C. School Information

1. Identification
   Enter the school name and address.

2. Grades Offered
   Place an "X" in each of the boxes corresponding to the grades taught in the school or separate school facility or annex. Also enter the total enrollment as of October 1 of the current year or the nearest date thereto when enrollment is considered to be stabilized.

3. Assignment of Principal
   If a principal is assigned to the school for which this report is intended, complete all the applicable items in this section.

Part II—STAFF STATISTICS

These series of items will reflect the full-time, part-time and new hires by the activity assignment classification as shown in the stub of the matrix, by sex for each of the designated racial/ethnic categories in columns A through L for either the system's report or the individual school's report.

A. Full-Time Staff (See section 2 of Appendix for definitions of assignment classifications)

Lines 1-19 should include all full-time employees, except for elected and certain appointed officials (as explained in the definition of "Employee" in section 1 of the Appendix). In the school system report, include in these statistics all full-time employees of the system, whether or not they are assigned part-time to one or more schools. On the other hand part-time employees of a school should not be counted as full-time employees in the school's report, even if they are full-time employees of the school system. With the exception of persons required to be reported on line 9, Psychological, report employees having multiple-activity assignments, such as teacher-counselor or similar combinations as is frequently the case in guidance, library, audio-visual, etc., as full-time in the assignment in which they spend at least 51 percent of the time. If the employee spends exactly 50 percent of the time in one of two assignments report him or her as full-time in the more critical one. If the time is distributed between more than two assignments, report the employee as full-time in the one in which he or she spends the major portion of the time or in the more critical one if the time is evenly distributed.

B. Part-Time Staff

Lines 20 through 22 should include statistics for all part-time employees. In a report for a school, these will include persons assigned part-time to that school, even though employed full-time by the school system.

C. New Hires

Lines 23-28 should include the number of full-time staff who have been newly hired by the school or the school system between July 1 and October 1 of the current year, for each of the assignment classifications listed. Use the definition of full-time shown in the Appendix for reporting new hires in school systems and individual schools. Do not report as a new hire an employee who has been on sabbatical or any other type of leave which is not considered a break in service, nor should anyone involved in a change in job category or promotion be reported as a new hire.

7. PRESERVATION OF RECORDS MADE OR KEPT

The EEO-5 report requires the combining of some data to complete the form. Separate agency-employment data by sex and race/ethnic identification in those job categories should be maintained on site in such form as is required in the EEO-5 report, and should be available upon request to representatives of federal agencies. Copies of submitted EEO-5 forms should be retained for a period of 3 years.

8. CERTIFICATION

Enter the telephone number (include area code and extension, if any), name, title, and signature of the person who is responsible for the report and can answer questions about it.

9. PUBLICATION OF EEO-5 DATA

The three organizations that sponsor EEO-5 operate under different legislative authorities and have different plans for publication.

The authority of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission enables it to obtain all the data items in Part II of the form. The items which the Office for Civil Rights is authorized to obtain are shown in the copy of the form that is marked for its use. The Office of Education is authorized only to obtain totals by activity assignment as presented in column "M" of the form.

Within these limitations, all three organizations plan to publish or otherwise make available statistics combining school systems into geographic aggregates, such as states, regions, etc. As restricted by Section 709(e) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the EEOC will not publish any data other than such aggregates.

The Office for Civil Rights may, as in some of its previous surveys, publish data by school system and for individual schools. The Office of Education will publish only individual school system data for those systems that have not indicated on the form that they are withholding authority for such publication.

APPENDIX

1. DEFINITIONS

b. "OCR" refers to the Office for Civil Rights, Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

c. "OE" refers to the Office of Education, Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

f. "School" refers to a division of the school system or district consisting of a group of pupils in one or more grade groups organized as a unit with one or more teachers to give instruction of a defined type and housed in a school plant of one or more buildings.

If a school has classroom facilities in more than one geographical location, a separate school report must be filed for each separate campus location or annex.

g. "State educational agency" refers to an agency of a State government that has some functional or jurisdictional relationship to the operations of the school systems or districts within the State.

h. "Employed" refers to a person employed by a school system or district, or a school, or a State-educational agency. This term shall not include any person elected to public office in a State or political subdivision of a State by the qualified voters thereof, or any person appointed by such officer to be on such officer's personal staff, or an appointee at the policy-making level, or an immediate adviser with respect to the exercise of the constitutional or legal powers of the office. However, this exemption shall not include employees subject to the civil service laws of a State government, government agency, or political subdivision.

i. "Full-time employees" refers to persons employed on a full-time basis during the pay period. These are the staff members of the school or the school system or district whose current assignments require their services at the school campus or who work for the school system or district for the whole day everyday (excluding temporary and substitute employees).

j. "Part-time employees" refers to persons employed during this pay period who are usually engaged for less than the regular full-time work week. Do not include temporary, or substitute employees.

k. "New hires" refers to persons who were hired for the first time or after a break in service for full-time employment by the particular school system or school between July 1st and September 30th of the current year.

2. ASSIGNMENT CLASSIFICATIONS (Lines 1 through 28 of Part II of the form.)

a. Line 1—Officials, Administrators and Managers: These are occupations requiring administrative personnel who set broad policies (not elected or appointed officials), exercise overall responsibility for execution of these policies, or direct individual departments or special phases of the school system, or district or school operations. Include in this category superintendent of schools, deputy, associate, and assistant superintendent of schools, school business officials, and other professional administrative staff. (DO NOT include principals, assistant principals or supervisors of instruction). Supervisors of service workers, skilled crafts and laborers should be reported (counted) in their corresponding categories.

b. Line 2—Principals: Staff members performing the assigned activities of the administrative head of their respective schools (not school systems or districts) to whom has been delegated responsibility for the coordination and direction of the activities of the school.

c. Lines 3 and 4—Assistant Principals:
(1) Teaching: Staff members who in addition to assisting the head of a school (normally the principal) in performing the activities of directing and managing schools are also engaged in instructing pupils in courses in classroom situations.
(2) Non-Teaching: Assignment of staff members to perform only the professional activities of assisting the head of a school (normally the principal) in performing the activities of directing and managing a school.

d. Lines 5, 6 and 7—Classroom Teachers: Staff members assigned the professional activities of instructing pupils in courses in classroom situations for which daily-pupil attendance figures for the school system are kept. Include in this category music, band, physical education, and home economics teachers, etc., as classroom teachers if they teach full-time at a school campus. Report classroom teachers separately for elementary, secondary or other. Use the local school system's definition of elementary and secondary. If a teacher has responsibility at both the elementary and secondary levels, report the teacher at one level only. DO NOT report the teacher as ½ elementary and ½ secondary. "Other Classroom Teachers" applies to full-time classroom teachers who teach ungraded classes, special education, art, music, band, physical education, home economics, etc., who have not been reported in the elementary or secondary classroom teacher categories.

e. Line 8—Guidance: Include staff members responsible for advising pupils with regard to their abilities and aptitudes, educational and occupational opportunities, personal and social adjustments, etc.

f. Line 9—Psychological: Include only the following individuals: psychologists, psychometrists, psychiatrists and psychological-social workers who are engaged in providing psychological evaluative services to pupils for placement purposes regardless of the amount of time spent in this activity. All other professionals engaged in placement of pupils should be reported in their most pertinent category in Part II-A such as item 1 (Officials/Administrators/Managers), item 8 (Guidance) or item 12 (Other Professional Staff), etc.

g. Line 10—Librarian and Audio-Visual: Librarians include staff members responsible for organizing and managing school libraries. Audio-visual personnel include staff members responsible for preparing, caring for, and making available to instructional programs, the equipment, materials, scripts, and other aids which assist teaching and learning through special appeal to the senses of sight and hearing, e.g., director of audio-visual services, scriptwriter, etc.

h. Line 11—Consultants and Supervisors of Instructions: Include staff members performing activities of leadership, guidance, and expertness in a field of specialization for the purpose of improving the performance of teachers and other instructional staff members.

i. Line 12—Other Professional Staff: Include staff members performing some instructional or related function on a full-time basis that cannot be properly classified for reporting on lines 2 through 11, such as non-classroom teachers who may be teaching the homebound, teaching through correspondence, teaching through radio or television from a studio, providing instruction for exceptional pupils released from regular classes for short periods of time, and instructing pupils in non-course (cocurricular) activities. Include persons engaged in psychotherapy and other mental health services such as psychiatrists or psychologists who are not reported in Part II-A, item 9 (See paragraph f above). Also included are professional non-instructional staff (not officials/administrators, etc.) such as physicians, dentists, speech therapists, school social workers, community workers, attendance officers, attorneys, architects, engineers, registered professional nurses and other professional noninstructional personnel.

j. Line 13—Teacher Aide: A staff member performing assigned activities which are not classified as professional educational, but which assist a staff member to perform professional-educational-teaching assignments. Include all personnel working with students under the direct supervision of a classroom teacher or under the direct supervision of a staff member performing professional-educational-teaching assignments on a regularly scheduled basis. In other words, aides who participate on a regularly scheduled basis in the formal educational effort directed toward the student and/or whose impressions of student educational progress or needs may contribute to the formal authorized educational evaluation of students should be classified as Teacher Aides.

Examples:

(1) Librarian aide
(a) A librarian aide who functions to fulfill particular educational needs of specific students on a regularly scheduled basis should be reported as a teacher aide.

(b) A librarian aide who functions essentially as a clerical or physical aide to the librarian and whose contact with particular students is casual or irregular should be counted in the assigned dept—Librarian and Audio Visual—line 10.

(2) Playground aide

(a) A playground aide who has been advised by the professional staff of the particular educational needs of specific children and who regularly directs efforts toward meeting these needs should be counted as a teacher aide.

(b) A playground Aide whose prime function is custodial should be counted as a service worker—line 16.

Line 14—Technicians: Occupations requiring a combination of knowledge and manual skill which can be obtained through about 2 years of post-high school education, such as is offered in many technical institutes and junior colleges, or through equivalent, on-the-job training. Includes: computer programmers and operators, film inspectors, projectionists, graphic artists, draftsmen, engineering aides, non-teaching-related mathematical aides, licensed, practical or vocational nurses, dietitians, photographers, radio operators, scientific assistants, technical illustrators, technicians (medical, dental, electronic physical sciences), and similar occupations which cannot be properly classified in other activity assignments.

l. Line 15—Clerical/Secretarial: These are occupations requiring skills and training in all clerical-type work including activities such as preparing, transcribing, systematizing, or preserving written communications, and reports or operating such mechanical equipment as bookkeeping machines, typewriters and tabulating machines. Includes: bookkeepers, messengers, office machine operators, clerk-typists, stenographers, court transcribers, hearing reporters, statistical clerks, dispatchers, license distributors, payroll clerks and kindred workers.

m. Line 16—Service Workers: (paraprofessionals and persons in cafeteria maintenance, transportation, etc.): Staff members performing a service for which there are no formal qualifications including paraprofessionals and nonsupervisory personnel in cafeteria, or transportation work. Include also custodial or others with the responsibility for cleaning the buildings of school plants or supporting service facilities; maintenance and operating such equipment as heating and ventilating systems; preserving the security of school property; and keeping the school plant safe for occupancy and use. Such activities may include cleaning, sweeping, disinfecting, heating, lighting, moving furniture, keeping school entrances appropriately locked or unlocked, keeping such facilities as fire escapes and panic bars in working order, and watchmen duties.

n. Line 17—Skilled Crafts: Occupations in which workers perform jobs which require special manual skill and a thorough and comprehensive knowledge of the processes involved in the work which is acquired through on-the-job training and experience or through apprenticeship or other formal training programs. Includes: mechanics and repairmen, electricians, heavy equipment operators, stationary engineers, skilled machining occupations, carpenters, compositors and typesetters and kindred workers.

o. Line 18—Laborers: Staff members who perform manual labor not classified in another activity assignment classification. Includes garage laborers, car washers and greasers, gardeners and groundskeepers or activities such as lifting, digging, mixing, loading and pulling operations.

o. Line 20—Professional Instructional: This classification (required under B. Part-Time Staff) should include all the activity assignment classifications listed in numbers 2 to 12 under A. Full-Time Staff in Part-II of the form.

3. RACE/ETHNIC IDENTIFICATION

You may acquire the race/ethnic information necessary for this report either by visual surveys of the work force, or from post-employment records as to the identity of employees.

Eliciting information on the racial or ethnic identity of an employee by direct inquiry is not encouraged. An employee may be included in the minority group to which he or she appears to belong, or is regarded in the community as belonging.

Where records are maintained, it is recommended that they be kept separately from the employee's basic-personnel file or other records available to those responsible for personnel decisions.

Since visual surveys are permitted, the fact that race/ethnic identifications are not present on employment records is not an excuse for failure to provide the data called for.

Moreover, the fact that employees may be located at different addresses does not provide an acceptable reason for failure to comply with the reporting requirements. In such cases, it is recommended that visual surveys be conducted for the employer by persons such as supervisors who are responsible for the work of the employees or to whom the employees report for instructions or otherwise.

Please note that conducting a visual survey and keeping post-employment records of the race or ethnic origin of employees is legal in all jurisdictions and under all Federal and State laws. State laws prohibiting inquiries and recordkeeping as to race, etc., relate only to applicants for jobs, not to employees.

Race/Ethnic designations as used by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission do not denote scientific definitions of anthropological origins. For the purposes of this report, an employee may be included in the group to which he or she appears to belong, identifies with, or is regarded in the community as belonging. However, no person should be counted in more than one race/ethnic group.

White should include persons of Indo-European descent including Pakistani and East Indian.

Black should include persons of African descent as well as those identified as Jamaican; Trinidadian, and West Indian.

Spanish Surnamed should include all persons of Mexican, Puerto Rican, Cuban, Latin American or Spanish descent. Spanish Surnamed, while not a race identification, is included as a separate ethnic category because of the employment discrimination often encountered by this group. For this reason do not include Spanish Surnamed under either White or Black.

American Indian should include persons who identify themselves or are known as such by virtue of tribal association.

Asian American should include persons of Japanese, Chinese, Korean or Filipino descent.

Other should include Aleuts, Eskimos, Malayans, Thais and others not covered by the race/ethnic groups on the form.

4. LEGAL BASIS FOR REPORTING REQUIREMENTS; RECORDKEEPING REGULATIONS

Equal Employment Opportunity Commission

a. Section 709(c), Title VII, Civil Rights Act of 1964 (as amended).

Every employer, employment agency, and labor organization subject to this title shall (1) make and keep such records relevant to the determinations of whether unlawful employment practices have been or are being committed. (2) preserve such records for such periods, and (3) make such reports therefrom, as the Commission shall prescribe by regulation or order, after public hearing, as reasonable, necessary, or appropriate for the enforcement of this title or the regulations or orders thereunder.

b. Chapter XIV, Title 29, Code of Federal Regulations

Subpart L—Public Elementary and Secondary School Systems, Districts, and Individual Schools Recordkeeping

Sec. 1602.39 Records to be made or kept.

On or before October 15, 1973, and annually thereafter, every public elementary and secondary school system or district, including every individually or separately administered district within a system, with 15 or more employees and every individual school within such system or district, regardless of the size of the school shall make or keep all records and information therefrom which are or would be necessary for the completion of report EEO-5 whether or not it is required to file such a report under Sec. 1602.41. The instructions for completion of report EEO-5 are specifically incorporated herein by reference and have the same force and effect as other sections of this part.[1] Such records and the information therefrom shall be retained at all times for a period of 3 years at the central office of the elementary or secondary school system or district, or at the indiviudal school which is the subject of the records and the information therefrom, where more convenient, and shall be made available if requested by an officer, agent, or employee of the Commission under section 710 of Title VII, as amended. It is the responsibility of every such school system or district, to obtain from the Commission or its delegate necessary instructions in order to comply with the requirements of this section.

Sec. 1602.40 Preservation of records made or kept.

(a) Any personnel or employment record made or kept by a school system, district, or individual school (including but not necessarily limited to application forms submitted by applicants and other records having to do with hiring, promotion, demotion, transfer, layoff, or termination, rates of pay or other terms of compensation, and selection for training or apprenticeship) shall be preserved by such school system, district, or school, as the case may be, for a period of 2 years from the date of the making of the record or the personnel action involved, whichever occurs later. In the case of involuntary termination of an employee, the personnel records of the individual terminated shall be kept for a period of 2 years from the date of termination. Where a charge of discrimination has been filed, or an action brought against an elementary or secondary school by the Commission or the Attorney General, the respondent elementary or secondary school system, district, or individual school shall preserve similarly at the central office of the system or district or individual school which is the subject of the charge or action, where more convenient, all personnel records relevant to the charge or action until final disposition thereof. The term "personnel record relevant to the charge," for example, would include personnel or employment records relating to the person claiming to be aggrieved and to all other employees holding positions similar to that held or sought by the person claiming to be aggrieved; and application forms or test papers completed by an unsuccessful applicant and by all other candidates for the same position as that for which the person claiming to be aggrieved applied and was rejected. The date of "final disposition of the charge or the action" means the date of expiration of the statutory period within which a person claiming to be aggrieved may bring an action in a U.S. district court or, where an action is brought against a school system, district, or school either by a person claiming to be aggrieved, the Commission, or the Attorney General, the date on which such litigation is terminated.

(b) The requirements of this section shall not apply to application forms and other pre-employment records of applicants for positions known to applicants to be of a temporary or seasonal nature.

Subpart M—Elementary-Secondary Staff Information Report

AUTHORITY—Sec. 709(c), 78 Sta. 265, 42 U.S.C. sec. 2000e-8(c); 29 CFR 1602.3.

(a) On or before October 15, 1974, and annually thereafter, certain public elementary and secondary school systems and districts, including individually or separately administered districts within such systems, and individual schools within such systems or districts shall file with the Commission or its delegate executed copies of Elementary-Secondary Staff Information Report EEO-5 in conformity with the directions set forth in the form and accompanying instructions. The elementary and secondary school systems and districts covered are: (1) every one of those which have 100 or more employees, and (2) every one of those others which have 15 or more employees from whom the Commission requests the filing of reports. Every such elementary or secondary school system or district shall retain at all times, for a period of 3 years, a copy of the most recently filed EEO-5 at the central office of the school system or district, or the individual school which is the subject of the report, where more convenient, and shall make the same available if requested by an officer, agent, or employee of the Commission under the authority of section 710 of Title VII, as amended. It is the responsibility of the school systems or districts above described in this section to obtain from the Commission or its delegate necessary supplies of the form.

(b) For calendar year 1973, the requirements of paragraph (a) of this section shall be carried out on or before November 30, 1973.

Sec. 1602.42 Penalty for making of willfully false statements on report.

The making of willfully false statements on report EEO-5 is a violation of the United States Code, title 18, section 1001, and is punishable by fine or imprisonment as set forth therein.

Sec. 1602.43 Commission's remedy for school systems, districts', or individual schools' failure to file report.

Any school system, district, or individual school failing or refusing to file report EEO-5 when required to do so may be compelled to file by order of a U.S. district court, upon application of the Commission or the Attorney General.

Sec. 1602.44 School systems', districts', or individual schools' exemption from reporting requirements.

If it is claimed that the preparation or filing of the report would create undue hardship, the school system, district, or individual school may apply to the Commission for an exemption from the requirements set forth in this part by submitting to the Commission or its delegate a specific proposal for an alternative reporting system prior to the date on which the report is due.

Sec. 1602.45 Additional reporting requirements.

The Commission reserves the right to require reports, other than that designated as the Elementary-Secondary Information Report EEO-5, about the employment practices of private or public individual school systems, districts, or schools, or groups thereof, whenever, in its judgment, special or supplemental reports are necessary to accomplish the purposes of Title VII. Any system for the requirement of such reports will be established in accordance with the procedures referred to in section 709(c) of Title VII and as otherwise prescribed by law.

Subpart N—Records and Inquiries as to Race, Color, National Origin, or Sex

Sec. 1602.46 Applicability of State or local law.

The requirements imposed by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in these regulations, subparts L and M of this part, supersede any provisions of State or local law which may conflict with them.

[1] Note.—Instructions were published as an appendix to the proposed regulations on June 12, 1973 (38 F.R. 15463).

Winton Act Bars School Boards from Adopting Binding "Memorandum of Agreement" on Terms and Conditions of Employment

According to the Court of Appeals, the Winton Act prohibits boards of education and school districts from adopting or ratifying agreements which deprive them of their authority to unilaterally establish terms and conditions of employment. Dismissing the contentions of the Certificated Employees Council of the Jefferson Elementary School District, the court held that the Act does not deprive teachers of their freedom of association under the First Amendment to the federal Constitution since it does not deprive them of any rights which they may possess as individuals. However, public-school teachers have no right to bargain collectively under state or federal law. The court decision declared the contract between the Council and the district to be null and void.

When a teacher, acting on the basis of the arbitration provision, requested that a wage dispute be submitted to arbitration, the school district filed suit in a lower court petitioning to have the agreement declared null and void on the grounds that it was a binding collective bargaining agreement and, therefore, illegal under the Winton Act which prohibits school boards from entering into binding contracts with representatives of "certificated employees." The Council argued that the agreement "was not a contract, but rather a proposal of provisions adopted by the Board as part of its rules and regulations" which by adoption became incorporated into individual contracts with new teachers.

A lower court ruled that the whole agreement was void, and, therefore, its binding arbitration provision was void and the teacher had no legal basis to request arbitration.

The Council appealed to the Court of Appeals requesting the court to reverse the lower court's decision on the grounds that (a) the agreement was not a contract; (b) the agreement was invalid because it violated the teacher's right of association under the First Amendment; (c) the agreement could not be entirely invalidated since it contained a severability clause and many of the provisions were within the board's power to adopt; and (d) the arbitration provision was valid, irrespective of the remainder of the agreement.

Ruling in favor of the district, the court said that the entire agreement was invalid since it was a binding agreement which deprived the board of its power to establish terms and conditions of employment, and, therefore, constituted an improper delegation of legislative authority by the board under the Winton Act. According to the court, that Act does not violate teachers' rights under the First Amendment since (a) it allows them to meet and confer with school boards and make recommendations; (b) public-school teachers have no right to bargain collectively under the First Amendment; and (c) the Act does not deprive teachers in an association of any rights they possess as individuals since it deprives school boards of the power to make binding agreements with individual teachers as well as their associations. Finally, the court held that since the agreement as a whole was invalid, individual provisions in it were necessarily inoperative, including the provision regarding binding arbitration. (Jefferson Elementary School District v. Bent, California Court of Appeals, September 24, 1974.)

DELAWARE

No Injunction Issued in the Absence of Teacher Strike

In the absence of a strike or evidence that the Delaware State Education Association had the intention or the opportunity to engage in such a concerted activity, the New Castle County Court of Chancery refused to grant the injunction sought by the State of Delaware and the Delaware State Board of Education. However, the court indicated that it would grant an injunction if a strike were to occur. Rejecting the Association's contentions, the court held that the "irreparable harm" of interfering with the right of children to go to school could not be legalized by the use of a personal leave day, and warranted the issuance of injunctions which the courts could not avoid because of the "complexity" of labor disputes. However, while stressing that normally teachers should respond to an employer's illegal actions by seeking legal remedies, the court noted that some "unclean action" by an employer might serve as grounds for denying an injunction.

After teachers returned to work following a one-day state-wide boycott, the state and the board requested the New Castle County Court of Chancery to issue an injunction ordering the Association and its members to refrain from similar work stoppages or strikes in the future.

The Association contended that its boycott was not an illegal strike but a "job action" since teachers had utilized the one day of personal leave allowed them under state law to conduct their protest. In addition, the Association argued that an injunction should not be issued automatically even if a strike was in progress, and cited previous decisions from other states which held that teacher strikes did not cause irreparable harm, that the courts should not issue an injunction on behalf of an employer who had provoked a strike by violating his duty to negotiate in good faith, and that the courts should avoid getting involved with labor disputes.

While denying the injunction, the court, rejected all of the Association's contentions. The court noted that the state legislature did not allow teachers a personal leave day in order to legalize strikes, and that strikes were illegal and caused irreparable harm since they interfered with "the right and duty of children to attend school" and that courts could not avoid enforcing the law because of the complexity of labor disputes.

However, while stressing that legal action rather than strikes should be the normal response of teachers to illegal actions by an employer, the court added that "one might imagine a case," where an injunction might be denied, because of some "unclean action" by an employer.

Finally, the court held that an injunction could not be issued in the absence of evidence that the Association or its members had the intention or the opportunity to engage in a strike or work stoppage, and that such an injunction would be futile since the Association had already returned to work. (The State of Delaware, Delaware State Board of Education, et. al. v. Delaware State Education Association, et. al., New Castle County Court of Chancery, October 2, 1974.)

ILLINOIS

Provisions Not Binding Until Legality Clarified

In an unusual suit brought by the East St. Louis Teachers Association in behalf of itself and the employer, School District #189, the Illinois Circuit Court, on appeal from a lower court, declared that no legal issues could arise under certain contract provisions which were not binding on the parties until a court ruled on their legality.

The issue stemmed from an agency shop provision in the collective bargaining agreement which had been withheld from taking effect, pending a court determination of its legality.

Alleging that the parties were in doubt as to the meaning of the provision in question, the union sought from the trial court a declaratory judgment concerning the rights and liabilities of the parties in accordance with the Civil Practice Act. Admitting all of the allegations, the board argued that the agency shop provision was in violation of the Act in that it required union membership as a condition for continued employment. The trial court, however, dismissed the action for want of jurisdiction.

The issue before the circuit court was to determine whether or not the trial court erred in dismissing the case. The court noted that although contractual provisions are a subject of inquiry, there must be a controversy between the parties before a declaration of rights can be made. It further observed that the declaratory judgment procedure is not intended to permit moot or hypothetical cases, or to enable parties to secure advisory opinions or legal advice from the court with respect to expected difficulties. (Meyer v. Madison County)

On the basis of the foregoing considerations, the court concluded that it was not within its province to make a determination on matters arising under a contract which was not binding. (East St. Louis Teachers Association vs. School District #189, Illinois Circuit Court, May 16, 1974.)

MISSOURI

Teachers' Strike Understandable and Not a Bar to the Enforcement of a Valid Procedural Agreement

The Circuit Court of St. Louis held that in spite of the absence of statutory collective bargaining, a procedural agreement between the Hazelwood Community Teachers Association and the Hazelwood Board of Education which required the board to negotiate with the Association before implementing its policies and to submit unresolved issues to advisory fact finding, was valid and binding, and could not be terminated without proper notice. Rejecting the board's contention, the court, held that while the Association had "dirty hands" as the result of a strike, the board had not suffered any direct injury from the strike, and, therefore, had no standing to request the court to refuse to enforce the fact-finding provisions of the agreement. The court held that the strike was a product of understandable "frustration and disgust" after good faith efforts to negotiate proved unproductive. Therefore, it ordered both parties to commence fact-finding.

Operating under a state law which prohibited school boards from negotiating binding collective bargaining contracts, the board and the Association entered into an agreement which required the board to negotiate with the Association before implementing new policies, and provided for advisory fact finding in the event of an impasse, but left the board with sole final authority to decide wages, hours, and working conditions. The agreement did not specify an expiration date, but stated that either party could terminate it at will with proper notice.

When an impasse occurred, the board refused to submit the issues to fact finding, and the Association, after engaging in a 7-day strike, petitioned the Circuit Court of St. Louis County to enforce the agreement.

In court the board restated its prior position at impasse, contending that the agreement was not an enforceable contract and that the fact-finding provisions were an invalid delegation of the board's authority. The board also contended that by implementing its new policies it had effectively terminated the agreement. Finally, the board contended that the association had no standing to request enforcement of the agreement in court since, owing to the strike, it had not entered the court with "clean hands."

The court held that the teachers' strike was understandable after two months of "nonproductive jawboning" with the board under circumstances of inflation, oversupply of teachers, and the absence of collective bargaining rights, and that since the board had suffered no direct injury as a result of the strike, it could not request the court to apply the "clean hands" doctrine. The court held that the agreement was valid since it left final authority over wages, hours, and working conditions with the board, binding since it created reasonable expectations which both parties had a right to rely on and enforce, and still in force since the board had not given notice to the Association that it was terminating the agreement.

Therefore, the court ordered the board and the Association to establish a fact-finding committee and submit the unresolved issues for consideration. (Hazlewood Community Teachers Association vs. Robert Bischof, Circuit Court of St. Louis County, Mo., September 3, 1974.)

NEW YORK

Unless Specifically Excluded from Contract, Tenure Is Negotiable

According to the New York State Supreme Court, since the Education Law does not explicitly prohibit a school board from negotiating on tenure, it is a subject of mandatory collective bargaining under the Taylor Law. Therefore, in the absence of a contract provision excluding tenure matters from the grievance procedure, the court held that disputes between the Romulus Central School District Board of Education and the Romulus Central School Faculty Association concerning tenure was subject to arbitration, and confirmed an arbitrator's award which modified the board's procedure for granting tenure under the Education Law, in order for the board to fulfill its obligations to evaluate a teacher in accordance with the procedures provided in its contract with the Association. The court also held that if the board refused to implement the award, it would be in violation of both the Taylor Law and the due process provisions of the federal Constitution.

When the superintendent refused to grant tenure to an art teacher who had completed his probationary period and had been recommended for tenure by his immediate supervisor, the Association filed a grievance under the evaluation provisions of its contract and the provision that a grievance could be based upon any event or condition affecting the welfare or terms and conditions of employment of any teacher. An arbitrator held that the teacher should be continued on probation for another year, during which time he was to receive a "fair and systematic evaluation" as provided in the contract.

Following the award, the superintendent ordered the board not to employ the teacher and the board notified the teacher that he was being dismissed. The board requested the court to vacate the award on the grounds that (a) the school board had previously objected that the issue was not arbitrable; (b) tenure cannot be subject to arbitration since allowing arbitration would deprive the board of its rights under the state Education Law to determine the competency of teachers; (c) in this case the arbitrator had created a method of granting tenure which differed from that specified in the Education Law; (d) the board could not implement the award since the superintendent who was not a party to arbitration had ordered the board not to implement it.

The court rejected the board's contentions as follows: (a) The board's previous objections to arbitration were irrelevant since it had not previously requested a stay of arbitration. (b) Since the Education Law does not explicitly prohibit a school board from negotiating on tenure, a board has the legal obligation to negotiate on tenure under the Taylor Law, and disputes concerning the resulting contractual obligations of the board should be settled by arbitration. (c) In the absence of a contract provision excluding matters related to tenure from the grievance procedure, the arbitrator had the right to order the board to modify its procedure for granting tenure in order to fulfill its contractual obligations. (d) Since the arbitrator's award was valid, the board was obligated under the Taylor Law and the due process provisions of the federal Constitution to implement it, irrespective of the order of the superintendent. (Romulus Central School Faculty Association v. Romulus Central School District, New York State Supreme Court, Seneca County, May 7, 1974.)

Common Council's Approval of Policemen's Contract Not Required for Validity

The New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, reversed a lower court ruling that a collective bargaining agreement approved by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment and negotiated between the city mayor and the police force association was subject to a requirement under the Public Employee Relations Act that the common council must approve the agreement before it can be executed.

The conclusion of the lower court that approval by the common council was necessary was based on the determination that a section of the Civil Service Law modified a provision in a minor statute which had vested the power to fix salaries of public employees in the Board of Estimate and Apportionment.

Judging this opinion to be a misconstruction, the higher court determined that section 204-a of the Civil Service Law requires only that the contract contain a statement that any provision requiring legislative action shall not be effective until the approval is granted. If the negotiating authority is delegated to a third party, approval is implied when the negotiating parties have reached agreement.

Concluding, the court stated that the policemen's association was entitled to a judgment declaring the contract to be valid. (John E. Creedon Police Benevolent Association, Inc., v. City of Utica, New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, May 23, 1974.)

OHIO

School Boards May Negotiate Legally Binding Agreements

The Vinton County Board of Education violated its contractual obligation by unilaterally terminating its agreement with the Vinton Teachers Association, an agreement entered into after a teacher strike. The Association filed a suit to force the board to fulfill the agreement which included changes in the grievance procedure with binding arbitration as a final step and a dismissal policy which would require that teachers be advised in writing the reasons for termination. The Association also asked for two-year contracts for teachers rehired for only one year. The school board argued that the motion should be dismissed since it did not believe that it had the authority to enter into a negotiated contract.

The Vinton County Common Pleas Court judge determined that "the school board is a body politic capable of being sued, bringing suit, contracting and being contracted with, and . . . they may lawfully enter into a collective bargaining agreement . . . with the teacher association." Furthermore, the court held that the board and the Association could enter into a "legally binding and enforceable collective bargaining contract and that they operated under this contract." But, the court added, it could not control the discretion of the board. The only limitations that the court could impose upon the board representatives was that they comply with the state statutes regulating schools. The court ordered the board representatives and the Association's negotiators to meet in good faith, otherwise a qualified third party neutral would be appointed to preside over negotiations. (Vinton Local Teachers Association v. Vinton Local Board of Education, Vinton County Court of Common Pleas, August 7, 1974.)

PENNSYLVANIA

Arbitrator Not Bound by Statutory Minimum Retirement Age Option Which the City Chose Not To Enact

The Pennsylvania Commonwealth Court ruled that since the City of Reading had not exercised its option under the Public Employee Relations Act to establish a minimum retirement age of 50 for policemen, an arbitrator's award could not be bound by that option. Therefore, the court confirmed an arbitrator's award requiring the city to pay retirement benefits to members of the Reading Lodge Fraternal Order of Police, No. 9, who chose to retire before the age of 50.

After an arbitrator's award required the City to pay retirement benefits to policemen who chose to retire after 20 years of service before reaching the age of 50, the city appealed to the Pennsylvania Commonwealth Court, requesting the court to reverse the award. The city contended that the award violated the Public Employee Relations Act which provided the city with the option of prescribing a minimum retirement age, but fixing the minimum at 50.

The court held that since the city had failed to exercise its option to fix a minimum age, the arbitrator could not be bound by that option, nor could the city exercise that option to "hide behind self-imposed legal restriction." (City of Reading v. Reading Lodge Fraternal Order of Police No. 9, Pennsylvania Commonwealth Court, October 3, 1974.)

FEDERAL

All Managerial Employees Excluded from Collective Bargaining Under NLRA

The Supreme Court of the United States ruled that all managerial employees are excluded from coverage under the National Labor Relations Act. The decision prohibits managers and supervisors from participating in a labor organization as a separate bargaining unit under the National Labor Relations Act. However, the Court reversed a lower court's decision which required the NLRB to use rulemaking when announcing new principles rather than the present method of adjudication in handling problems on a case-by-case basis. The Court thus remanded Bell Aerospace Co., Textron Inc. and United Auto Workers, Amalgamated Local 1286, to the appellate court to permit the Board to make its decision conform with the Court's opinion.

On July 30, 1970, the union, seeking to be certified as bargaining representative for 25 buyers employed by the company, requested the NLRB to order a representation election. The buyers purchased all of the company's supplies from outside vendors, and when other departments did not stipulate a particular supplier, the buyers were free to place any order up to $5,000 without the approval of a superior. In addition, a buyer served as chairman of the team which made purchase decisions for the project which represented 70 percent of the company's sales.

On the basis of these functions, the company contended that the buyers were "managerial employees," and, therefore, were not covered by the National Labor Relations Act and had no right to participate in a labor organization in a separate bargaining unit. In addition, the company argued that unionization would create a potential conflict of interest since the buyers would be more receptive to bids from union contractors and would influence "make or buy" decisions in favor of creating additional work for sister unions.

The NLRB held that even though the buyers might be managerial employees, they were not excluded from the protection of the National Labor Relations Act since their work did not involve the formulation or implementation of labor relations policies, and Congress, in passing the Taft Hartley Act, had intended to exclude only managerial employees whose duties and responsibilities would give rise to a conflict of interest. The Board dismissed the company's argument of potential conflict of interest as unsupported conjecture, holding that the company had sufficient authority to control any temptation of the buyers to give preferential treatment to union contractors.

The company stood by its position that the buyers were managerial employees and refused to bargain. When the Board, acting upon a petition from the union, found the company guilty of unlawful refusal to bargain and ordered it to bargain with the union, the company appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals, 2nd Circuit, seeking reversal of the Board's order.

The appellate court held that Congress had intended to exclude "all true managerial employees" from coverage of the Act, including all those whose duties involved formulating or determining any employer policy, or making judgments on behalf of an employer independent of any established policy, and not just policies connected with labor relations. The court held that while it was possible that the buyers "were not sufficiently high in the managerial hierarchy to constitute true 'managerial employees'," the Board, acting on a new and erroneous assumption that the Act excluded only those whose duties in connection with labor relations policy created a conflict of interest, had failed to make a proper factual determination of the buyers' status.

Therefore, the court remanded the case to the Board, requesting it to determine if the buyers were in fact managerial, and in consideration of the fact that in all previous decisions the Board had held that buyers were excluded from the Act, the court held that if the Board were to conclude that these buyers were not "managerial," it should proceed by rule-making and formally establish a guideline as to which buyers it would consider managerial, rather than proceed by adjudication on a case-by-case basis.

The Board filed a writ of certiorari, requesting the Supreme Court of the United States to hear the case.

With respect to the issue of "rule-making" verus "adjudication," the Supreme Court unanimously rejected the lower court's position and held that "the Board is not precluded from announcing new principles in an adjudicative proceeding" since buyers have widely varying duties depending on the company or the industry. According to the high Court, it was proper to proceed on a case-by-case basis since any general rule would have no more than marginal utility.

However, the Supreme Court was split on the issue of whether all managerial employees were excluded from the National Labor Relations Act. The majority held that "the Board's early decisions, the purpose and legislative history of the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, the Board's subsequent and consistent construction of the Act for more than two decades, and the decisions of the courts of appeals, all point unmistakably to the conclusion that 'managerial employees' [those who formulate and effectuate management policies by expressing and making operative the decisions of their employer] are not covered by the Act."

Therefore, confirming the lower court's decision, the Court remanded the case "to permit the Board to apply the proper legal standard in determining the status of these buyers."

A dissenting opinion held that the language of the National Labor Relations Act indicated that only supervisors were excluded from coverage, and since nothing in the legislative history of the Act or Board decisions prior to the Act precluded other managerial employees from organizing in separate bargaining units, there was no reason for the Court to require the Board to follow an erroneous interpretation of the Act which it made on only two occasions, that all managerial employees were excluded. (NLRB v. Bell Aerospace Co., Textron Inc., U.S. Supreme Court, April 23, 1974.)

Labor Relations Law Excluding Police Not in Violation of Constitutional Rights

A Missouri labor relations law not according police the right of other public employees to present pay and employment proposals to their employers does not violate their constitutional rights according to a federal court panel responding to a suit brought by the St. Louis County Police Officers Association against a former superintendent of police.

The suit was vested on the premise that the law had a "chilling effect" on policemen's ability to exercise their constitutional rights of free speech, assembly, and redress of grievances. The court observed that while the statute in question did exclude policemen and was phrased in declaratory language, it did not imply that policemen were prohibited from organizing or from presenting proposals to their employers, nor was there any mention in the law that a public employer was authorized to penalize a police officer for exercising those rights.

An examination of the facts revealed that the policemen had been permitted to exercise their rights of freedom of speech and association, and that the board of police commissioners had recognized and dealt with the representatives of the police officers.

In making an important distinction between the right of "all" citizens and the right of "collective bargaining," the state supreme court held that union membership was protected by the right of association under the First and Fourteenth Amendments. In regard to the right of true "collective bargaining," the court pointed out that no such right was granted to any public employee either by the debatable labor relations law or by any other statute of Missouri.

Judging that the facts presented demonstrated the absence of any actual controversy respecting the law, the federal court dismissed the case without prejudice. (Edward Fitzgerald et al., vs. Robert J. diGrazia, et al., U.S. District Court, Eastern District of Missouri, August 22, 1974.)

INDIANA

Employer's Insistence on Complete Package and Settlement of "Discussables" as Preconditions to Negotiation Held Improper; Employer May Poll Teacher Preferences on Up-coming School Calendar

Under the Indiana Classroom Teacher Collective Bargaining Act, a school employer is required to negotiate in the absence of a complete package of proposals from an employee organization and may not insist on the settlement of "discussable" items as a precondition to negotiations on "bargainable items."[1]

Therefore, the Indiana Education Employment Relations Board ruled that the Tippecanoe School Corporation had established improper preconditions to bargaining and ordered it to proceed without further delay in negotiating a contract with the Tippecanoe Education Association.

After eight meetings, at which the school corporation refused to proceed with negotiations on salary, the Association filed a complaint, charging the corporation with frustrating the meetings. The corporation contended that it could not negotiate on salaries until the Association produced a complete package with full explanations of the details and costs involved, and asserted that the Association was responsible for the delays, since the Association had refused to settle on discussable items, including bulletin boards and mail boxes, which the corporation had insisted on as a precondition to discussing salaries and other bargainable items.

Ruling in favor of the Association, the Board held that the Association's salary proposal was sufficient as a starting point for negotiation, and that the corporation's insistence on the settlement of discussable items as a precondition for negotiating on bargainable items was tantamount to requiring the Association to waive meaningful discussion on discussable items. The Board concluded that "waiver of meaningful discussion [on discussable items] as a pre-condition to bargaining is more than is required of the school employee organization by law."

The Board, however, rejected the Association's charge that the corporation had committed an unfair labor practice by polling teachers as to their preferences for an up-coming term school calendar. The Board held that while the corporation had to negotiate a final settlement on the calendar with the Association, it had the right to bypass the Association in ascertaining the preferences of the teachers. (Bobbe June Blom v. Tippecanoe School Corporation, IEERB, July 5, 1974.)

[1] Under the Indiana Teacher Bargaining Law, salary, wages, and hours, fringe benefits, and grievance procedure are referred to as subjects of bargaining, while all other negotiable items are referred to as subjects of discussion.

MASSACHUSETTS

Discharged Nontenured Teacher Has No Right to Counsel at Investigative Hearing Called at the Discretion of School Board

Under the federal Constitution and the Massachusetts Municipal Employee Relations Act, a school board that is not otherwise obligated by contract, does not have to grant a hearing to a nontenured teacher whose contract is not being renewed. If a school board grants a hearing at its discretion, it may refuse to permit the teacher to be accompanied by attorneys or a member of the staff of the teacher's bargaining unit, provided that no action will be taken against the teacher as a result of the hearing. Therefore, the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission dismissed a complaint of unfair labor practice filed against the town of Nantucket by the local teachers association.

At the request of the Association, the Nantucket School Committee scheduled a termination hearing for two nontenure teachers. The committee denied an Association request that the teachers be represented at the hearing by the Association or attorneys. The hearing took place as scheduled, but the committee did not reverse its earlier decision. The Association filed a complaint with the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission, charging that the committee had committed an unfair labor practice by refusing to allow the teachers to be represented.

The Commission noted that the Supreme Court of the United States had ruled that a nontenure teacher whose contract was not renewed was not entitled to a hearing and that the committee had granted the hearing at its discretion. It concluded that since the hearing was purely investigative and no action was taken against the teachers as the result of the hearing, the committee was not obligated to permit the teachers to be represented. MICHIGAN

Union's Insistence on Retaining Prior Negotiated Concession Is Not a Refusal To Bargain

The Michigan Employment Relations Commission dismissed the charge by the Lake Shore Public Schools that Lake Shore Federation of Teachers refused to bargain in accordance with the Public Employment Relations Act (PERA). During contract negotiations the union refused to agree to the proposal by the school district to change the qualifications agreed to in the prior contract for vocational teachers.

The school district alleged that "the union insisted to the point of impasse that vocational education teachers employed by the school district possess qualifications beyond that required by State law or State Board of Education regulations and that such subject matter is not a mandatory subject of bargaining" under PERA. Additionally, the school district said that although it agreed to negotiate the subject in the past, it was now withdrawing permission to negotiate the subject.

The union contended that although the issue was a voluntary rather than mandatory subject of bargaining, the subject had previously been agreed upon and was now moot.

In reaching its conclusions, the Commission first pointed out that the subject of educational qualifications of vocational teachers was not moot since there was outstanding disagreement between the parties on the subject. Secondly, the union did discuss the issue with the school district on four occasions and the facts failed to establish that the union insisted to the point of impasse that the school district negotiate a nonnegotiable subject. Concluding, the Commission held that the union's insistence on retaining a prior concession which might have been a voluntary subject of bargaining was not a refusal to bargain. (In the Matter of Lake Shore Federation of Teachers, Respondents, and Lake Shore Public Schools, Charging Party, Michigan Employment Relations Commission, January 7, 1974.)

Bargaining History Determines Who Is the Employer for Purposes of Collective Bargaining

When there is no reason to depart from an established pattern of bargaining, bargaining history may be decisive in determining who is the employer for collective bargaining purposes. Therefore, to promote uniformity of bargaining in the Oakland Intermediate District, the Michigan Employment Relations Commission held that the Clarkston Board of Education was the sole employer of teachers employed at a vocational-technical education center which it operated under contract from the district and that the teachers could appropriately be included in the bargaining unit of the Clarkston Education Association. The MERC then ordered a self-determination election among the teachers.

The Association petitioned MERC to designate the vocational center as part of its bargaining unit and order a representation election. In its petition, the Association designated both Clarkston and the Oakland Intermediate District as employers. Clarkston maintained that it was not involved either as the employer of the teachers or as joint employer with Oakland.

A MERC hearing officer determined that Clarkston was one of four local constituent districts operating vocational-technical education centers under identical contracts with the Oakland Intermediate District. Under its contract, Clarkston hired and paid for the staff, but these funds were channeled through the district which chose and coordinated the program at the center, and provided funds for administrative overhead. While Clarkston hired the principal, it did not exercise the same degree of involvement in the administration of the Center as it did in other schools.

However, the district, in its contract with Clarkston, had not specifically reserved to itself the right to bargain collectively for the staff of the center. In the other three centers, the local school districts acted as the sole employer for the purpose of collective bargaining and teachers in those centers were included in the local NEA bargaining unit.

Reviewing the record of the hearings, MERC held that just as history of bargaining may be decisive in determining the scope of a bargaining unit, it may also be decisive in determining who the employer is for collective bargaining purposes, and that in this case, there was no reason to depart from the established pattern. Therefore, to promote uniformity of bargaining within the district, MERC held Clarkston to be the sole employer of the teachers in question.(In the Matter of Clarkston Community Schools, Board of Education and Oakland Schools Intermediate Board of Education, and Clarkston Education Association, Michigan Employment Relations Commission, February 22, 1974.)

NEW YORK

Conflict of Interest Warrants Removal of Department Chairmen and Directors from Teaching Unit

The Public Employment Relations Board declared that basic differences between the interests of department chairmen and directors of school districts and the interests of teachers warranted the removal of the former from the teachers' bargaining unit. Adhering to the precedent set in Roslyn, the Board further stated that supervisors of different rank might be placed in the same unit.

The Mineola Association of Professional Supervisors (MAPS) filed a petition seeking decertification of the Mineola Teachers Association because the unit included supervisory employees of the Mineola Union Free School District whose interests conflicted with those of the teachers.

PERB was asked to determine whether or not the MAPS was an employee organization, whether there was sufficient conflict of interest that would require the removal of the department chairmen and the directors from the teaching staff unit and if so, whether they should be placed in their own separate unit or grouped with the supervisory and administrative personnel.

Concerning the issue of MAPS' status, the hearing officer found that the body met the requirements for an employee organization as established by the Fair Employment Act. On the question whether the duties performed by the department chairmen and directors could be classified as supervisory and, therefore, constitute cause for their removal from the teaching unit, the hearing officer concluded that not only were their functions largely supervisory, but also they created sufficient conflict of interest to justify removal of the department chairmen and directors from the teaching unit. In regard to the matter of proper placement of these employees, the hearing officer, supported by the employer's assertion of administrative convenience and lack of any evidence which might indicate possible negotiating conflict between the groups, declared that the most appropriate unit would consist of all supervisors. The different levels of supervision was reconciled by the rationale in Roslyn which stated that "it is not legally inconsistent to include supervisors of different ranks, but not supervisors and rank-and-file employees, together in one unit."

Therefore, the hearing officer determined the unit in which various employees should be placed and ordered an election by secret ballot among those employees. Personal Leave with Pay for Activities Not Entailing Legal Matters Denied

Deciding that a teacher's purchase of an estate was the only matter which qualified as legal business under the contract, an arbitrator concluded that the teacher could be reimbursed for only two days of a five-day personal leave since two days was sufficient to execute the business.

After returning from five days' leave and being refused use of paid personal leave for that time, the teacher filed a grievance and appealed to the superintendent on the grounds that her business of house hunting and applying for a new job out of state could not be conducted at another time.

In response to the grievance and upon the recommendation of the superintendent, the Board approved two days of personal leave to account for travel and the actual house purchase.

Noting that the teacher/board agreement restricted the use of personal leave to do legal business, the arbitrator upheld the Board's action. (Bethel Park School District and Bethel Park Federation of Teachers, American Arbitration Association, October 1, 1974.)

Without Contractual Requirements To Bargain Management Rights Clause Prevails

A school board's statutory duty to manage and determine curriculum is restricted when such actions impact on the terms and conditions of employment. Stressing the impact factor of such decisions, an arbitrator reluctantly ruled that elimination of a course offering resulting in the nonrenewal of the instructor was not a term or condition of employment. Therefore, "short of an explicit contractual provision, requiring the Board to bargain on such matters," the arbitrator dismissed the contention of the Lakeshore Education Association, that the Lakeshore Area Board of Vocational, Technical, and Adult Education was required, by virtue of a maintenance of standards clause, to negotiate with the Association before eliminating a course. The Board's contention that a management rights clause had preserved its statutory authority to take unilateral actions regarding curriculum was sustained.

The Association filed a grievance, and requested the board to negotiate its decision to eliminate a course and not to renew the instructor's contract. The board refused to negotiate, and with the Association's consent the matter was brought directly to arbitration.

The Association requested the arbitrator to order the board to reinstate both the program and the instructor until it negotiated with the Association as required by the maintenance of standards clause. The Association contended that by agreeing to the maintenance of standards clase, the Board had bargained away its unilateral right to control the curriculum and that elimination of the course constituted a change in policy which affected the terms and conditions of employment.

The Board argued that it had retained its statutory right to control the curriculum through a management rights clause which stated that the Board retained powers and rights conferred upon it by state and federal laws, and that its decision was a proper exercise of management prerogative.

Noting that the specifications of the grievance addressed only the question of a board's statutory duty to manage, the arbitrator was forced to rule that the determination of courses to be offered was not a term or condition of employment owing to an absence of "an explicit contractual provision requiring the Board to bargain on such matters." Specifically, the arbitrator held that this award in no way precluded bargaining over the course elimination and the consequent non-renewal. New Rules To Implement Public Employment Relations Act

The Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission (MLRC) and the Massachusetts Board of Conciliation and Arbitration adopted rules which will help implement the recently enacted Public Employment Labor Relations Act.

The new rules adopted by MLRC cover definitions; representation petitions and elections; prohibited practices; filing negotiated agreements; requests for binding arbitration; petitions to investigate a strike or potential strike; priority hearings on complaints based on temporary relief or restraining orders; and designation of the executive secretary, attorneys, and examiners as agents of MLRC.

With at least a 30 percent showing of interest, an employer, an employee organization, or a "substantial number" of employees will be granted an election to determine representation. A 10 percent showing of interest may merit a hearing by MLRC to determine if a secret ballot election should be conducted unless a bargaining agreement is in effect or another election has taken place in the preceding 12 months. Also detailed are procedures for challenging a voter's eligibility or the conduct of an election for runoff elections, and for clarifying or amending an existing bargaining unit or amending certification of a bargaining representative.

Included in the prohibited practices rules are procedures for filing complaints; giving notification of hearings; filing answers or denials of complaints; conducting hearings, including examination and payment of witnesses, objections to the manner in which a hearing is conducted, oral arguments, and post-hearing briefs.

The Massachusetts Board of Conciliation and Arbitration (MBCA) issued rules governing mediation and factfinding—who may file for mediation and factfinding, when and where to file, appropriate form for petition, and service procedures on the opposite party. If the Board is notified of an impasse, a mediator will be appointed within seven days to determine if an impasse exists. Should an impasse exist, the Board will appoint a mediator within five days unless the parties have agreed to select an outside mediator. If the impasse persists beyond 20 days, a fact finder will be appointed unless the parties agree to select their own fact finder. Within 30 days the fact finder must issue a report which includes a statement of the issue, finding of facts, rationale for the recommendation, and a statement of the recommendation. If the impasse continues after consideration of the report, the issues in dispute will be returned to the parties for further bargaining.

The new rules also outline procedures for disqualification or withdrawal of a fact finder, withdrawal of a factfinding petition, the fact finder's authority and responsibility, scheduling of conferences and hearings by the fact finder, how the fact finder should handle mediation should the parties opt for mediation, and hearing rules. The hearing rules cover proceedings in the absence of a party, conduct of the hearings, parties' representatives, intervention, order and record of proceedings, evidence, objections, and termination of hearings.

Since Massachusetts law mandates binding final offer arbitration in case of impasse in negotiations for firemen and policemen, MBCA also issued rules in this area. A petition for final offer arbitration may be filed when a dispute between the parties reaches an impasse, all other dispute resolution procedures have been exhausted, and 30 days have passed since publication of the factfinding report. The parties must then appoint one arbitrator each and the two arbitrators selected will then select a third arbitrator who will serve as chairman of the panel. The initial hearing will be held within 10 days of the appointment of the chairman. In making its determination the panel will consider such things as the financial ability of the municipality to meet costs; interests and welfare of the public; hazards of employment; physical, educational, and mental qualifications; job training and skills involved; wage and employment comparisons; fact finder's report; the cost of living; and the stipulation of the parties.

Arbitration hearings must be concluded within 40 days and the award must be issued no later than 10 days after the conclusion of the hearing. The panel chairman may remand the dispute to the parties for further collective bargaining at any time before the award is rendered if he is of the opinion that it would be helpful. Should the parties reach agreement outside arbitration, they must notify the panel in writing and request the panel chairman to suspend the proceedings.

Motion for Reconsideration of PERC Decision Allowed

The New Jersey Public Employee Relations Commission issued a change in the rules and regulations governing the motion for Commission reconsideration effective March 7, 1974. A party to a proceeding before the Commission may, because of extraordinary circumstances, move for a reconsideration after the Commission decision has been rendered.

The party must state the material error claimed and, where applicable, specify the precise source, must file the motion within 15 days after the Commission decision, and must print or otherwise duplicate such motion. Copies must be served on the parties and a statement of service must be filed with the motion papers. NEW YORK

Unit of Assistant District Attorneys Certified

Rejecting the city's contention that assistant district attorneys were excluded from collective bargaining as managerial and confidential employees, the New York City Office of Collective Bargaining held that under the Taylor Law managerial employees were those who established new policy, and confidential employees were those who assisted managerial employees in a confidential capacity in the performance of labor relations functions. Therefore, the OCB, acting on a petition filed by the Association of New York City Assistant District Attorneys, certified a bargaining unit consisting of assistant district attorneys and criminal law investigators below the level of bureau chief.

The petition was submitted on August 31, 1973. The city unsuccessfully moved to dismiss the petition on the grounds that the Association was not a labor organization within the meaning of the New York City Collective Bargaining Law. Having rejected this contention at a preliminary hearing, the OCB then dealt with the city's substantive arguments.

The city contended that a recent amendment to the Taylor Law which excluded assistant attorneys general from collective bargaining as managerial and confidential employees, also applied to assistant district attorneys since their functions were similar. In addition, the city contended that assistant district attorneys were confidential employees since "they must maintain a relationship of flexibility and undivided loyalty to the district attorney and there is a potential conflict of interest since they may have occasion to investigate labor union activities involving city employees."

The OCB held that (a) the rights and status of assistant district attorneys were not affected by the Taylor Law Amendment since the state legislature had the power to include them and did not do so; (b) the assistant district attorneys, except for bureau chiefs, were not managerial employees, since their normal function was to follow established policy rather than to establish new policy; (c) assistant district attorneys were not confidential employees since they did not perform labor relations functions and the Taylor Law specifically classified confidential employees as those who assisted managerial employees in a confidential capacity in the performance of labor relations functions; (d) other law enforcement officials, police, and county investigators had been unionized for some time without any evidence of conflict of interest or impaired performance resulting, and there was no evidence that the situation would be otherwise for assistant district attorneys. Therefore, the OCB certified a bargaining unit consisting of assistant district attorneys and criminal law investigators below the level of bureau chief. OHIO

Bargaining Provision Limiting Pregnancy Benefits in Conflict with EEOC Guidelines

Affirming an arbitration award which set aside a collective bargaining provision limiting pregnancy benefits in violation of EEOC sex discrimination guidelines as properly within the arbitrator's power, the Ohio State Court of Appeals at the same time reversed and vacated the award owing to failure to make timely application for the confirmation of such award.

At issue in this appeal from a lower court brought by the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company was the question of pregnant employees' entitlement to the same leave and disability benefits provided other employees. The union, United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, claimed benefits accorded pregnant workers were discriminatory by reason of sex. The arbitrator concluded that the insurance benefits agreement between the parties conflicted with the EEOC Guidelines interpretation of Title VII, Civil Rights Act of 1964, making such terms discriminatory, and that the specific terms had to conform to the guidelines. The company filed a complaint in a lower court, seeking to vacate the award and alleged that the arbitrator had exceeded his authority.

Finding that the EEOC Guidelines are not regulations having the force of law, but evidence of the Commission's interpretation of the Civil Rights Act, the lower court concluded that the arbitrator had not exceeded his authority.

The Appeals Court observed that the agreement between the company and the union provided that the arbitrator "shall have the authority only to decide the question pursuant to the provisions of Part V applicable to the question, but he shall have no authority in any way to alter, add to, or subtract from any such provisions. The decision of the impartial umpire shall be binding on the Employer, such Employee, and all other interested parties."

The court further pointed out that valid applicable statutory provisions are parts of every contract as fully as if extended in writing, thus justifying the inclusion of the Civil Rights provisions in the insurance contract. Determining that the applicable law was not the guideline but the provisions of the Civil Rights Act and that it was applied not to alter the contract or as a public law in conflict with the bargaining agreement between the parties, but simply a material provision written into the contract, the court asserted that the arbitrator's decision could not be impeached for error.

Concluding that the arbitrator did not exceed his authority, the court upheld the judgment of the lower court. However, since the union filed no motion for confirmation, that applicable part of the award was reversed and vacated. (Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company v. Local Union No. 200, United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, Ohio State Court of Appeals, April 17, 1974.)

FEDERAL

"Last Hired, First Fired" Principle Valid Under Title VII

The U.S. Court of Appeals, 7th Circuit, partially reversing the decision of a federal district court, held that the seniority rights of white workers under a collective bargaining agreement which established the "last hired, first fired" principle of seniority, remained valid under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, even when the employer had engaged in past discrimination in hiring. But in light of the employer's history of past discrimination, and the "potentially discriminatory impact" of the seniority system, the Court upheld the lower court decision that an agreement between the Wisconsin Steel Works and the United Order of American Bricklayers and Stonemasons, Local 21, which accorded priority in recall to white bricklayers, who had forfeited their seniority rights in return for severance pay, over a recently hired black bricklayer, unlawfully perpetuated past discrimination.

Rejecting the union's contentions that it could not be sued, the court held that two black bricklayers who had filed suit were not required to exhaust EEOC remedies or the contract grievance procedures in order to sue in federal court, that the union was liable as a party to the recall agreement, and that the plaintiffs' right to sue the union was not affected by nonmembership.

The court also rejected the company's contention that in order to prove past discrimination, the plaintiffs were required to show that black applicants were denied actual jobs, and held that a charge of past discrimination, not related to the hiring of a specific individual, was proven by the absence of a single black bricklayer in spite of repeated attempts by blacks to obtain employment as bricklayers.

However, the court, reversing the decision of the district court, held that a black bricklayer who was never hired by the company as a result of the priority in recall accorded to the white worker was not discriminated against and, therefore, had no claim against the company. In addition, the court held that the lower court had acted arbitrarily in calculating the amount of damages and attorneys' fees awarded to the plaintiffs. Therefore, the court remanded the case to the district court for recomputation of the damages and attorneys' fees due the black bricklayer whose rights were violated by the agreement.

The black bricklayer was hired by the company in July 1964. Before 1964, the company had employed no black bricklayers and blacks who had been employed by the company as laborers since 1947 were repeatedly denied opportunity available to white laborers to transfer to the bricklayers' apprenticeship program.

As a result of the "last hired, first fired" seniority system which had been included in the collective bargaining agreements between the company and the union since 1946, the black bricklayer was laid off in September 1964 as part of a company plan to reduce its force of bricklayers on the assumption that they would no longer be needed. By March 1965, over 30 bricklayers, including whites with 10 years' seniority, were laid off.

In September 1965, eight white bricklayers who had been laid off opted, under a severance agreement between the union and the company, to forfeit their seniority rights in return for severance pay of $966. However, in June 1966, the company decided that it needed more bricklayers and entered into an agreement with the union restoring the seniority of the eight white bricklayers who had forfeited their rights. Three of them returned to work before January 1967 without reapplying to the company for employment.

The June 1966 agreement remained unknown to the black bricklayer until March 1967 when he returned to work under a company policy of recalling former employees who did not have contractual seniority rights. If the June 1966 agreement had not restored the seniority of the white workers, the company would have recalled him in January rather than in March. In addition, the June agreement resulted in his being laid off for a second time in May 1967.

Following this second layoff, the black bricklayer requested the Equal Opportunity Commission to reconsider charges which he and another black bricklayer had filed before the Commission in May 1966. The company had refused to hire the second black bricklayer, who was a union member, but had never worked for the company. The black bricklayer had charged that the company's layoff of one of them under the seniority system, and refusal to hire the other had constituted unlawful racial discrimination under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The Commission, which had dismissed their complaints as unsubstantiated in February 1967, now concluded that since the company had reinstated the three white bricklayers who had forfeited their seniority rights while refusing to hire one black bricklayer and reinstate another, the black bricklayers had grounds to sue in the federal courts.

In August 1967, while the case was still before the EEOC, the company recalled the black bricklayer whom it had laid off in May. However, he had already found other work and refused the offer on the grounds that the recall might prejudice the outcome of his case.

In 1968, the black bricklayers filed suit in a federal district court, charging that the company and the union had violated the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 since (a) the company had discriminated in hiring before 1964; (b) the seniority system of "last hired, first fired," provided in the collective bargaining agreement between the company and the union, perpetuated prior discrimination and was, therefore, unlawful under Title VII, and all layoffs of black bricklayers which had occurred under that agreement were illegal; and (c) the June 1966 agreement between the company and the union had placed white bricklayers ahead of black bricklayers. On this basis, the black bricklayers requested the district court to order the company and the union to pay them damages equivalent to the wages they would have received in the absence of discriminatory layoffs and hiring.

The district court at first dismissed the case on procedural grounds in 1969. However, on appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit, reversed the lower court decision, and the Supreme Court of the United States refused to rehear the case. Therefore, in 1973, the U.S. district court, which had previously dismissed the case, ruled on the substantive issues. The district court sustained the charges of the black bricklayers on all counts and ordered the company to offer them employment, and together with the union to pay each of them $5,000 in damages plus attorneys' fees.

The company and the union appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit on the following grounds: (a) The union contended that it could not be sued since its participation as signatory of the collective bargaining agreement and the June 1966 agreement restoring seniority were not sufficient grounds for liability; (b) the black bricklayer who had been laid off was not a union member and, therefore, had no standing to sue the union; and (c) the black bricklayers could not sue in a federal court since they had failed to exhaust the grievance procedure provided in the collective bargaining agreement, and had not previously filed charges against the union regarding the June 1966 agreement with the EEOC. The company contended that in the absence of evidence that black applicants were denied actual job openings, the charge that the company had discriminated before 1964 could not be sustained; that the "last hired, first fired" seniority system was not in violation of Title VII since it was racially neutral, and striking it down would result in reverse discrimination; and that the June 1966 agreement to restore the seniority of a group of white bricklayers was not discriminatory since the white bricklayers would have been entitled to prior recall anyway under the company policy of recalling employees without contractual rights according to length of service. In addition, both the black bricklayers and the defendants contended that the calculation of the back pay award for attorney's fees was improper.

The court dismissed the union's contentions that it could not be sued, stating that: (a) the union as an integral party to the June 1966 agreement shared liability with the company; (b) nonmembership in a union had no bearing on the right of blacks to enter into an employment contract on the same basis as whites; (c) there was no requirement to exhaust contractual remedies for claims brought under any of the civil rights acts; and (d) since the June agreement which produced the primary charge of discrimination occurred after the black bricklayers filed their initial claim with EEOC, they had a reasonable excuse for failure to exhaust EEOC remedies.

In addition, the court dismissed the company's claim that proof of discrimination before 1964 was absent, holding that a charge of past discrimination, not related to the hiring of a specific individual, did not require the plaintiffs to show that black applicants were denied actual jobs, and that the absence of a single black bricklayer before 1964 in spite of repeated attempts by blacks to obtain such employment was sufficient evidence.

Therefore, in the light of the company's "past history of racially discriminatory hiring practices and racially neutral yet potentially discriminatory impact of the employment seniority system utilized by the company," the court held that the company's action of according priority in recall to white bricklayers over black bricklayers when neither possessed contractual seniority rights perpetuated past discrimination into the present. The court rejected the contention that this action would have resulted from company policy since that policy was "not clear with respect to the priority status of white workers who had accepted severance pay," but noted that if company policy would have produced this result, the policy would be in violation of the civil rights statutes.

However, while the court held that the June agreement violated the rights of the black bricklayer who had been laid off under the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and the Civil Rights Act of 1964, it held that the agreement did not discriminate against the black bricklayer who had never been employed by the company since "a policy favoring recall of a former employee with experience even though white before considering a new black applicant without experience comports with the requirement of Title VII . . . ."

Furthermore, the court held that the legislative history of Title VII indicated that the "last hired, first fired" principle of seniority remained valid under the Act, even when an employer, as a result of past discrimination, employed an all-white labor force, and newly hired blacks had less seniority than whites, provided that the seniority system gave workers equal credit for actual length of service with an employer, irrespective of department or job. Therefore, the court, reversing the judgment of the district court, ruled that the seniority system incorporated into the collective bargaining agreement between the company and the union was valid.

Finally, the court held that the district court had not properly calculated damages since it improperly gave consideration to the absence of a racially discriminatory motive on the part of an employer, and computed the amount due attorneys solely on the basis of "hours spent times the billing rate."

Therefore, the court remanded the case to the district court, instructing it to modify its award by calculating the wages which the remaining plaintiff would have received if he had been employed from January 17, 1967, when he would have been recalled in the absence of the June agreement, until September 5, 1967, when he turned down an offer of recall by the company, and then subtracting from the total wages due during this period the amount he actually received between March and May. In addition the district court was instructed to recompute the attorneys' fees awarded on a basis which took account of factors, other than hours and the billing rate, which are included in the American Bar Association's Code of Professional Responsibility. THE CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—JANUARY 1975

The Consumer Price Index rose 0.5 percent in January to 156.1 (1967=100), the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the U.S. Department of Labor reported. . . .Higher prices for medical care services, utilities, houses, cereal and bakery products, and fresh fruits and vegetables were responsible for a large part of the January rise. The effect of these increases was partially offset by price declines for clothing, autos, beef, sugar, and lower mortgage interest rates.

On a seasonally adjusted basis, the rise in the January CPI was 0.6 percent; this compares with increases of 0.7 percent in December and 0.9 percent in both November and October. The food index rose 0.8 percent in January, after seasonal adjustment, about the same as in December and considerably less than in the August-November period. The January nonfood commodities index rose 0.6 percent after seasonal adjustment, continuing the slower rate of increase evident since last fall. The increase of 0.8 percent in the services index in January was about the same as in the final 3 months of 1974.

In January 1975, the CPI was 11.7 percent higher than in January 1974. The food index was 11.2 percent, the nonfood commodities index 12.5 percent, and the services index 11.4 percent above their levels of January 1974.

Monthly changes in detail (not seasonally adjusted)

The index for food purchased in grocery stores, which usually shows no change in January, rose 0.6 percent. Prices for cereal, bread, other bakery products, and sugar-based products—such as nonalcoholic beverages and candy bars—continued to rise rapidly. Prices also rose in January for pork, fats and oil products, and fresh fruits and vegetables. However, beef prices declined for the fourth consecutive month, and prices for poultry, dairy products, and processed fruits and vegetables turned down. In addition, sugar prices declined, reflecting lower prices at the wholesale level. The index for food away from home—restaurant meals and snacks—rose 0.8 percent, the same as in recent months.

The index for nonfood commodities remained unchanged in January. Prices for apparel and textile housefurnishings declined sharply due to widespread winter clearance sales. The new car index declined, reflecting the effect of manufacturers' rebates to consumers. The used car index continued to move down. In addition, prices decreased slightly for tires and furniture. These declines offset price increases for other nonfood commodities such as gasoline, appliances, houses, housekeeping supplies, toilet goods, drugs, and tobacco products.

The services index increased 0.8 percent in January. Higher charges for medical care services, particularly hospital services, and for utilities—gas, electricity, and water and sewerage—accounted for about half the rise in the services index in January. Charges for other types of services, such as housekeeping and home maintenance, barber and beauty shop, dry cleaning and automatic laundry services, and movie admissions continued to rise. Mortgage interest rates, however, declined sharply, and auto insurance charges moved down. Telephone rates also decreased due to a reduction in the Federal excise tax effective January 1, 1975.—U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, News Release, February 21, 1975.

STATE LEGISLATION ON IMPASSE PROCEDURES AFFECTING TEACHERS

Barbara Bell

The objective of collective bargaining is to have the parties reach an agreement. Frequently, labor and management are confronted with an impasse over recognition or bargainable items and are unable to resolve a dispute. To break the impasse, the parties may resort to one or more of the three mechanisms for resolving disputes, namely, mediation, fact-finding, and arbitration.

An analysis of state statutes, executive orders, and attorney general opinions reveals that 26 states have legislation concerning impasse procedures affecting teachers. Ranging widely in scope, the statutes set forth the procedures and conditions under which settlement is to be reached. Each of the three mechanisms of resolving disputes involves intervention of a neutral third party. However, the role of the neutral in each procedure is different.

Mediation involves the intervention of a third party who acts as a facilitator to the communication of proposals and the intent of each party and who assists the parties to reach an agreement. Mediation is the most frequently legislated method of impasse resolution, though it is not often used in settling disputes in public sector education. While the mediator has no formal decision-making role, his intercession greatly affects the ultimate settlement. By statute or state labor board regulations, mediation may be initiated any time between the notice of termination of an agreement and the final settlement. A mediator may suggest avenues of agreement and present either party's position in a non-biased manner, but he may not force or dictate agreement.

Even though most state laws provide for mediation as a first step in dispute settlement, often where disagreement on the facts of the issues exists, the parties may bypass mediation and go directly to fact-finding.

Equal numbers of states provide for advisory and binding fact-finding decisions; while in arbitration, two states are governed by advisory decisions and seven states by binding decisions. In Nevada, if the parties do not agree to make the decision binding, either party may request the governor to do so.

The publication of facts in fact-finding and arbitration is either mandatory or by agreement of the parties. More states have mandatory agreement policies in their statutes than have voluntary agreement.

The purpose of fact-finding is to determine the facts relative to the merits of the position(s) of either side and to induce the parties to accept or modify their position on the basis of these findings and move the parties to voluntarily reach an agreement. A single fact-finder or a fact-finding panel comprised of a neutral and a representative of each group, may be employed and charged to make an advisory or binding determination and/or recommendation to the parties. These findings may be made public immediately, or they may first be made available exclusively to the parties who have the opportunity to accept them. If they are rejected, they are usually, by statute, made public to bring public pressure to bear on acceptance of them or renewal of intensified negotiations.

The third method of resolving disputes, arbitration, differs from mediation and fact-finding in that the third party is charged with deciding which proposals are fair and equitable, thereby dictating a settlement. There are two types of arbitration decisions—binding and advisory. Arbitration may be a mandatory statutory requirement, or a voluntary statutory requirement on the parties, contingent on acceptance by the parties. Arbitration brings fact-finding to a conclusion in that the arbitrator considers the facts and renders a decision about which of the opposing positions should be accepted by the parties, or presents a middle ground as a panacea to the dispute. The decision in advisory arbitration, however, may be accepted or rejected by the parties. Arbitration as a final attempt at settlement may be voluntary or compulsory with the decision being either advisory or binding. Often these factors are in combination, i.e., voluntary binding arbitration, compulsory binding, voluntary advisory, or voluntary binding.

Binding arbitration enjoins the parties to accept the arbitration decision. Some statutes, however, provide that an arbitration decision may be appealed under exceptional legal circumstances.

The following presents some of the more salient features of the state statutes on resolving disputes (see Table 1).

Twenty-three, 87 percent, of the states provide recourse to mediation; 19, 76 percent, to fact-finding; and 11, 43 percent, to arbitration. Nine states have a combination of mediation and fact-finding, but no state has a combination of fact-finding and arbitration procedures. Connecticut is the only state with both mediation and arbitration arrangements. Thirty-four percent of the states, representing Indiana, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island, have incorporated in their statutes all three methods of impasse resolution.

In the states with collective bargaining laws for teachers, the means of resolving impasses most frequently designated are mediation and fact-finding. An examination of mediation provisions finds that this process is voluntary and by request of one or both parties in 22 of the 26 states and compulsory in only six. Mandatory submission of issues at impasse to a specific fact-finding or mediation procedure has not gained general acceptance. Similarly, few states mandate compulsory arbitration as the procedure for settling an impasse for teacher negotiation.

The majority of the state statutes provide that the selection be made by the party representatives. In the event that the parties are unable to agree upon a neutral third member, the state labor relations board or some jurisdictional body submits a list of names to be alternately struck by the parties or assigns a third party neutral. Five states provide that the neutral party be appointed by a labor relations board or commission. Most states allow the selection of the third party neutral from the American Arbitration Association or the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service.

Summer school salaries for 1974 shall be adjusted by the amount of the above increase. This shall also apply wherever percentages of salaries are used.

  All salaries of continuing employees shall be increased by 5.5% or $825 per year, whichever is greater.

  In addition 1% of the 1973-74 salary base shall be set aside for Merit Increases as described in this Agreement.

  An additional increase of 1% of the 1973-74 salary will be made for continuing librarians in lieu of an inequity increase.

Salary Adjustment for Faculty—Inequities Fund

Within 30 days of the signing of this Agreement, a University Inequity Adjustment Committee shall be formed. It shall consist of a representative from the Office of the President, the Vice President for Academic Affairs (or one person designated by him), one small school Dean and one other Dean (each selected by the Council of Deans), and four members named by the AAUP.

The Committee shall first consider among other things the differences between colleges in average salaries by years of service in each rank to see if they represent inequities. Using its best judgment, the Committee shall then apportion among the various colleges an amount of money equivalent to 1% of the 1973-74 salary base of faculty members within the bargaining unit in a manner designed to help correct salary inequities between colleges and within colleges. It shall complete the apportionment between colleges within 60 days after its appointment.

The procedure for distributing these funds to individual faculty members within each college in order to correct individual inequities shall also be determined by the University Inequity Committee. All inequity salary increases so determined shall be effective January 1, 1975.

- Redressment of Wage Inequities for Women and Minorities (Faculty and Academic Professionals)

In order to identify and correct any existing faculty salary inequities based on sex or race, Temple and AAUP shall each appoint six persons from within the University community to serve on a Salary Review Committee.

The Committee's responsibilities will be three-fold: (1) to develop a comprehensive system for determining any internal inequities affecting women or minority faculty members; (2) to guide and advise departmental faculties, chairpersons and deans in redressing any such inequities; and (3) to hear appeals from persons who are dissatisfied with redressment decisions of departmental faculties, chairpersons and deans.

Within 30 days of the signing of this Agreement, the members of the Salary Review Committee will be named. The Committee shall collect data as it deems appropriate on such matters as teaching, research and service. Appropriate support staff and computer time will be made available to the Committee. It will run a multiple regression on the data for the majority group (white males) in each school, department or group of departments.

Data for a woman or a minority member will be substituted into the appropriate equation and an estimated salary will be computed and compared with the present salary. The difference, if any, between the estimated salary and the present salary will be submitted to departmental faculties, chairpersons, and deans as a basis for investigating whether an inequity exists. The Committee will be available to work closely with departmental faculties, chairpersons, and deans to help determine if redressment awards should then be recommended. The departmental faculties, chairpersons and deans will inform the Salary Review Committee of their respective decisions.

Any person who is dissatisfied with his redressment award (or lack thereof) as decided by the above process may appeal to the Salary Review Committee. In the event the Committee decides that the appeal has merit, it shall consult with the appropriate dean before submitting its final recommendation to the Academic Vice President. The Committee will also send a written statement of its decision to the person involved.

If the Academic Vice President does not agree with the Committee, he shall so inform the woman or minority person and the Committee of his reasons. The decision of the Academic Vice President shall not be subject to the grievance and arbitration provisions of this Agreement.

The Salary Review Committee shall complete its development of the comprehensive system for determining any internal inequities and shall send estimated salary data to departmental faculties, chairpersons and deans by February 15, 1975.

- Inequity Redressment for Academic Professionals:

An academic professional who believes there is a disparity in salary because of race or sex may avail himself of the grievance procedure herein.

- Matching Offers:

In the event that the Administration wishes to pay any member of the bargaining unit in terms more favorable than those set forth herein, it may do so provided that it makes a written request with a detailed rationale to the AAUP and the AAUP grants its written approval in regard thereto; except, however, when the departmental faculty, chairperson and Dean wish to retain a faculty member who has a bona fide offer (in writing) from a rival institution, the Dean (with the approval of the departmental faculty and the chairperson) may offer a competitive salary adjustment to attempt to retain the individual without the prior approval of the AAUP. In the event that a salary increase results, Temple shall inform the AAUP in writing within ten days of the decision.

- Summer Compensation:

Summer teaching shall be paid at the rate of 3% of the preceding academic year salary for each semester hour taught.

FEDERAL WAGE CONTROLS

If the Federal Government institutes wage controls in any form and any portion of this collective bargaining agreement is deferred or cut back, the parties may meet to consider a reallocation of the monetary equivalent of the dissapproved wages or benefits in a manner that would result in government approval.

SELECTION AND COMPENSATION OF DEPARTMENT CHAIRPERSONS

The AAUP and Temple University recognize that the role of the chairperson differs among academic units across the University and even within departments in any school or college. Accordingly, the AAUP and Temple agree that in the designation of any chairperson the mode of designation of the department's nominee shall be determined by the department, provided that the department shall consult with the Dean before making a final determination of the procedure and that the last such instance of consultation shall occur no more than thirty days before a nominee is to be designated. Normally, no chairperson shall be nominated or appointed without the approval of a majority of full-time faculty of the department. Should the Dean find it necessary not to accept the department's nominee, he shall ask for an alternate nominee. Should mutual concurrence not then be arrived at, the Dean may then appoint an acting chairperson but shall account for his action to the appropriate faculty body in his college.

Accordingly, the AAUP and Temple agree that the designation of the departmental chairperson shall be the mutual concern and shall require the input of the Dean and the departmental faculty, and that no chairperson shall be designated without departmental faculty and Dean concurrence in the appointment.

Chairpersons are appointed for initial terms not to exceed five years. Beyond this, with due consideration to the value of change, they may be reconsidered for an additional term or terms not to exceed five years each.

Incumbent chairpersons shall finish their current terms.

Department chairpersons or department heads in the library may receive extra compensation in addition to their salaries for their administrative duties. When they do receive such extra compensation, the AAUP will be notified in writing of the amount and the reasons for the extra compensation.

OTHER: Early retirement at age 62 for those at least age 55 and employed a minimum of 10 years; provision for accelerated payment of contributions to provide benefits as if the individual had served to age 67.

ASSOCIATION: Payroll deduction of dues; maintenance of standards; no strike/lockout provision; released time for librarians and academic professionals granted for processing grievances during normal working hours; right to use school buildings upon notice and approval on the same basis as granted to any group within Temple; bulletin boards are to be designated for posting Association communications; no cost for use of campus mail service; the board will provide information relating to wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment of members of the bargaining unit; one AAUP telephone number is to be listed in the university telephone directory.

INSTRUCTION: Compensatory time granted for work beyond the normal work week hours; time and a half off for all hours worked between 4:30 p.m. on Friday, or the day preceding a holiday, and 8:30 a.m. Monday or 8:30 a.m. of the next regularly scheduled work day following a holiday.

PERSONNEL: Grievance procedure ends with final and binding arbitration; the right to review personnel file by the employee at his request, a separate administration file is also to be kept; 2 years maximum probation with a written evaluation made by the director at least annually which is to be discussed with the academic professional, signed by both and placed in the academic professional's personnel file; the tenure policy is not to have quotas limiting the number of persons who can advance to the level of tenure; the appeals process notifies within 2 weeks the decision rendered in favor of tenure or its rejection; an aggrieved faculty member is to notify Temple and AAUP of an appeal; a committee is to be appointed jointly by Temple and AAUP and by majority vote, the committee either confirms the decision, reverses, or remands one time for such further consideration as it deems appropriate;

> If the case is remanded for such further consideration and as a result the established time limits for a tenure decision are exceeded, it is hereby understood that this will not constitute de facto tenure. The committee shall be empowered to direct when reconsideration must be completed. If the reconsideration decision extends past July 1, and the final decision is against tenure, the faculty member shall then receive an additional one year terminal contract.
> If following remanding a committee must again be constituted, the members thereof need not be the same persons as those who served on the committee when the matter was initially remanded.
> The decision of the committee shall in all cases be final and binding upon Temple, the AAUP, and the faculty member involved. A tie vote shall be deemed to be a confirmation of the decision of Temple.

Dismissal because of retrenchment will be exercised in the order of part-time, non-tenure, tenure faculty with least years of service; persons denied promotions except for a position of department chairperson, or rank within the bargaining unit may utilize the grievance and arbitration provisions; for new positions for academic professionals created, the university will develop and implement a proper rate and report it to the AAUP; when a salary for a new position is established, the AAUP may within 30 days file a grievance alleging that such new rate does not bear a fair relation to other rates; Article IX of the present contract defines appointments, promotions, and termination of service for librarians.

CALIFORNIA

Evaluation Guidelines Do Not Relieve Employer of "Meet and Confer" Requirements

A state law providing that each school district must develop and adopt guidelines for the evaluation and assessment of teacher performance and be receptive to the advice of certificated personnel does not exempt them from the Education Code provisions requiring "meet and confer" sessions with representatives of certificated employee organizations concerning terms and conditions of employment.

Two Monterey teacher organizations sought relief in the California Court of Appeals from a lower court judgment denying their petition for a writ of mandamus and a preliminary injunction against the Monterey Peninsula Unified School District. The teachers contended that the trial court erred in concluding that it was not the intention of the legislature to make the Stull guidelines subject to the Winton Act "meet and confer" requirements. The lower court responded that section 13486 of the Stull Act provided its own procedure for teacher representation in the adoption of guidelines and that this requirement was fulfilled by the utilization of the Certificated Personnel Evaluation Committee. The court then followed the rules of statutory construction, the later and more specific language of the Winton Act.

Noting that the rules were not applicable unless the language of the two statutes could not be harmonized, the court of appeals interpreted the Stull "advice" requirement as a mandatory requirement. Were it not for the advice requirement, the court argued, the guidelines could be developed and adopted without the participation of the affected employees since the Winton Act did not require a school employer to meet and confer on an issue unless requested to do so by representatives of the certificated employees. In this sense it was evident that the advice requirement of the Stull Act harmonized with the "meet and confer" requirement of the Winton Act. The court further observed that the Stull Act provision for giving teachers a voice in the development and adoption of the guidelines was in addition to, not to the exclusion of, the meet and confer process.

To the teachers' next contention that the trial court erred in concluding that the Stull guidelines governed tenure and were exempt from the "meet and confer" requirements of the Winton Act, the court, having considered the language of the act, determined that the lower court based its conclusion on a sentence which upheld the pre-eminence of tenure over other considerations. Interpreting the sentence in proper context, the court of appeals asserted that the legislature intended tenure regulations to be subject to the "meet and confer" requirement. The "meet and confer" process was not intended to strengthen those rules and regulations by establishing orderly and uniform methods of communication between teachers and administrators. Although the court had encountered no case interpreting section 13080 of the Winton Act, it asserted that Los Angeles County Firefighters Local 1014 v. City of Monrovia interpreted substantially identical language in the Meyers-Milias-Brown Act, which amended and expanded the George Brown Act, an equivalent and source of the Winton Act.

Recalling the Monrovia case in which the city contended that the superseded language created a specific exemption, the court noted that the contention was rejected by the tribunal in that the latter was of the opinion that the legislature intended by the entire act to set forth reasonable principles which public agencies must follow in their rules and regulations in the administration of employer-employee relations; and further, that the legislature did not intend to replace the field of public employer-employee relations except where public agencies do not provide reasonable methods of administering employer-employee relations. Inasmuch as the evaluation under the Stull guidelines was made a permanent attachment of the employee's file, thereby constituting a direct connection with employer-employee relations, the court disagreed with the trial court's conclusion that the Stull guidelines were beyond the scope of the Winton Act as they did not involve employment conditions and employer-employee relations.

Responding to the district's contention that the teachers were barred from declaring that the development and adoption of the Stull guidelines were subject to the requirement of the Winton Act because of their untimely request to meet and confer, the court called attention to the precise language of the lower court's findings which inadvertently negated the district's argument.

The court reversed the trial court's judgment and ordered it to grant the teachers' petition for a writ of mandamus and issue an injunction to enjoin the district from applying its guidelines pending its compliance with the meet and confer requirements of the Winton Act, (Certificated Employees Council of the Monterey Peninsula Unified School District et al, v. Monterey Peninsula Unified School District, California Court of Appeals, October 4, 1974.)

ILLINOIS

School Board May Not Dismiss for Cause Without Following Evaluation Procedure Specified by Contract

The Illinois Appeals Court, First District, held that under a contract specifying a procedure for evaluating teachers, a school board cannot dismiss for cause unless it has followed the evaluation procedure specified in the contract, even if the cause refers to events that took place outside the classroom. In addition, the court held that when a school board, within the time limit specified by the Illinois Tenure Act, fails to exercise its option to extend a teacher's probationary status, the teacher automatically becomes tenured. Therefore, the Court confirmed a lower court verdict granting a writ of mandamus which ordered the Cook County Board of Education to grant tenure to a member of the Illinois Education Association whom it had dismissed.

During the first three semesters of employment with the board as a probationary teacher, the teacher had not been evaluated in accordance with the requirements of the contract between the board and the Association. After several incidents in which the teacher encouraged students who were protesting against the board and made an obscene gesture to security officers during student protests, the board dismissed the teacher on grounds of his conduct during these incidents, and his general lack of cooperativeness and failure to fulfill his responsibilities, without advising him of his rights under the Illinois Tenure Act. Under that Act, the teacher had become tenured after the board failed to send him written notice to the contrary 60 days before the end of his second year.

The teacher filed a grievance, contending that his dismissal was in violation of both the contract and the Tenure Act. After an arbitrator ruled against him in an advisory arbitration proceeding, the teacher and the Association filed a writ of mandamus with an Illinois trial court, requesting the court to order the board to grant him tenure as required by the Act.

After the trial court granted the writ, the board appealed to the Illinois Appeals Court, First District, alleging that (a) the writ could not be granted to enforce contractual obligations; (b) the contract did not bar dismissing a nontenured teacher for cause, and was not applicable to dismissals based on events outside the classroom; (c) the contract was void if it barred the dismissal, since the board could not bargain away its statutory right to dismiss for casue; and (d) the lower court had "usurped" the statutory power of the board to decide to grant the teacher tenure or extend probation for another year.

The Court held that while the contract did not eliminate the statutory power of the board to dismiss for cause, it required the board to take specified steps regarding evaluation in order to exercise that power. Since the board had not taken those steps, the teacher's dismissal was invalid. In addition, since the board had not exercised its option to extend probation within the statutory time limit, the teacher was tenured, and the lower court had acted properly in granting the writ of mandamus to enforce the teacher's statutory rights.

The lower court verdict was affirmed. (Illinois Education Association v. Board of Education, Cook County; Ill. App.Ct., 1st Dist., October 3, 1974.)

MASSACHUSETTS

Maternity Provision Unconstitutional

On appeal from a lower court, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court remanded for recalculation of back pay awards a determination reinstating two public-school teachers terminated under an unconstitutional maternity provision.

Shortly after the teachers were forced to resign owing to their pregnancy, they received a letter informing them that sick leave benefits did not extend to pregnancy and that they were terminated as of the date of the letter. They complained to the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination, and an investigating commissioner notified the superintendent that he had found probable cause concerning the complaints and suggested a conciliation which included a revocation of their termination order and a six-month retroactive maternity leave with a right to reinstatement and benefits. The school committee accepted this offer, but the teachers rejected it.

The teachers argued that the board's unilateral termination was a "dismissal" of tenured teachers which, under Massachusetts General Laws, was illegal because they were not given notice and a hearing. The school committee maintained that the letter of termination did not apply to the statute cited by the teachers but rather to a rule as to pregnancy which supported a "forced resignation." Although the dismissal had the tone of absolute termination and the school committee had never invited the teachers to return to work, the court determined that the letters represented an effort to enforce the rule requiring pregnant teachers to resign, while implying rights of reinstatement. Under this circumstance, the termination letters were not dismissals within the scope of the statute which dealt with complete separation.

On the question of the constitutionality of the termination, the court, guided by recent Supreme Court decisions involving school-board regulations which required teachers to terminate their services long before the expected date of birth, asserted that such rules penalized the pregnant teacher and interfered with her freedom of personal choice. Further, such restrictions were found to foster no state interest and the limiting of a teacher's right to return to work until the beginning of the semester following the date on which her child was three months old, rested on an irrebutable presumption of disability that was unnecessary, arbitrary, and irrational.

Having determined that the rule of the Malden school committee was invalid, the court had to determine whether the treatment accorded the teachers met constitutional standards. The court determined that categorical disallowance of all sick pay for disabilities related to pregnancy was improper when sick leave was allowed for other disabilities.

The school committee invoked the doctrine of mitigation applicable to discharges under contracts for personal service, that is, if the discharged employee can by reasonable efforts obtain work to compensate for his loss of salary, he would to that extent be denied a monetary recovery. The teachers argued that tenured teachers were exempted from the rule on mitigation. Referring to Police Commr. of Boston v. Ciccolo, which upheld the right of discharged employees to reinstatement without loss of compensation but subject nevertheless to the rule of mitigation as in McKenna v. Commissioner of Mental Health, the court declared that the cases cited by the teachers were not applicable. The court further stated that the school committee was charged with the burden of proof that the teachers could have mitigated their losses through the procurement of similar employment. The argument that the teachers could have returned to their jobs in the Malden school by accepting the terms of conciliation proposed by the commissioner was rejected by the court on the grounds that the teachers' refusal to accept those terms did not satisfy the school committee's burden as to mitigation, even if the conciliation proposal was understood to be an offer of reinstatement, for the proposal compromised the very constitutional right that the teachers were asserting. The court ordered the decree vacated and the cases remanded for further investigation. (Francine E. Black and Kathleen M. Lane v. School Committee of Malden et al., Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, April 26, 1974.)

MONTANA

School Board May Issue Individual Teacher Contracts Before Ratification of Agreement

Upholding a lower court decision, the Montana Supreme Court ruled that the Billings School Board did not violate the statutory duty to bargain in good faith when it issued individual contracts to teachers before signing a master contract with the Billings Education Association (BEA). After the parties reached an impasse in negotiation of a second contract, an impasse panel issued recommendations. The two parties finally agreed on all the recommendations except one, so no master agreement was ratified before the board tried to distribute individual contracts to teachers. BEA obtained a temporary order restraining the board from issuing or accepting individual contracts. Later a hearing was held to show cause why the board's action should not be restrained.

Reflecting on the Montana Professional Act for Teachers, the court pointed out that issuance of individual contracts not in conformance with the master agreement was not prohibited. However, the Act provides that the master agreement controls in cases of inconsistent provisions in individual contracts. Further, the law mandates that teachers have contracts before they teach. The court concluded that it was not necessary for a master agreement to be negotiated and ratified before the board could offer individual contracts. The Supreme Court of Montana agreed with this decision and pointed out that the right to individual contracts did not require a master contract, only a good faith effort to negotiate, and the school board had made such an effort. (Billings Education Association, Inc., vs. Board of Trustees of Billings, School District No. Two, Yellowstone County District Court, August 5, 1974.)

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Right-To-Know Law Does Not Require the Press To Be Present at Negotiating Sessions

The New Hampshire Supreme Court ruled that the state right-to-know law did not require the public to be present at negotiating sessions between public employers and employees, but required only that the public be informed of the terms of the resulting agreements. Therefore, the court confirmed a lower court decision which denied an injunction to reporters who were seeking to prevent the Concord Union School District from excluding them from bargaining sessions between the district and the Concord Education Association.

A newspaper reporter had requested to attend one or more of the bargaining sessions between the Association and the district traditionally closed to the public. When the district refused his request, the reporter and several colleagues filed suit in a state trial court, contending that their presence at the bargaining sessions was required under the state right-to-know law, regarding the decisions and considerations on which government action was based, and requested the court to enjoin the district from excluding them from the sessions. The trial court refused to grant the injunction on the grounds that the presence of the reporters would disrupt negotiations and delay the adoption of the school budget.

The reporters appealed to the New Hampshire Supreme Court, contending that the right-to-know law required that "all public proceedings of any school district must be open to the public." The district contended that such an application of the law would destroy the state collective bargaining statute, which utilizes the established techniques of private sector bargaining, since the collective bargaining process cannot "operate effectively if exposed to the public eye."

The Court held that in the absence of evidence that the state legislature had considered the application of the right-to-know law to public sector bargaining, it was improbable that the legislature would have applied the law in a manner that would "destroy the very process it was attempting to open to the public." The record indicated that "the presence of the public and the press at negotiating sessions would inhibit the free exchange of views and freeze negotiators into fixed positions from which they could not recede without loss of face." However, the Court reminded the district that the right-to-know law required the board to approve the agreement arrived at in open session, so that the public's right to know what was agreed to in the contract will be protected. (Talbot v. Concord Union School District, New Hampshire Supreme Court, July 30, 1974.)

NEW JERSEY

Teacher's Right of Free Speech Not Absolute

The New Jersey Supreme Court affirmed a lower court decision which ordered the State Commissioner of Education to hold a hearing on the petition of a South Plainfield teacher, alleging that the South Plainfield Board of Education had unconstitutionally retaliated against the teacher's exercise of her right to free speech by refusing to renew her contract, and further that the South Plainfield Education Association had the rght to intervene. While noting that a teacher's right to free speech does not include verbal attempts to usurp the authority and prerogatives of administrators, the court refused the Commissioner's request for binding guidelines pending the submission of the hearing record.

After the board failed to renew the contract of a teacher who would otherwise have received tenure, the teacher filed a grievance stating that the board's action was retaliation for her questioning and criticizing certain administrative policies and directives before her co-workers and was, therefore, a violation of her right to free speech under the First Amendment to the federal Constitution.

When her grievance was denied, the teacher and the Association filed a petition with the State Commissioner of Education requesting that the board's action be reversed. In her petition the teacher reiterated her grievance and presented evidence from her supervisor's report, substantiating her claim that she was not renewed because of her public remarks.

The Commissioner dismissed the petition on its face without taking testimony, on the grounds that the petition contained only "naked allegations," and ruled that the Association had no standing to appear as co-petitioner.

The teacher then appealed the Commissioner's ruling to the State Board of Education which submitted the matter to its Law Committee, and upon receiving its report denied the appeal without affording the teacher an opportunity to examine the Committee's report.

The state appellate court ruled that the State Board of Education had acted improperly by failing to permit the teacher to examine the Law Committee's report, that the Association should have been permitted to continue as petitioner, and that the Commissioner had improperly dismissed the petition since it contained enough evidence to require the taking of testimony as a formal hearing. The appellate court remanded the case to the Commissioner.

The Commissioner then appealed to the New Jersey Supreme Court, seeking reversal of the appellate court decision and requesting guidelines for handling the case if the appellate court order was sustained.

The New Jersey Supreme Court upheld the appellate court ruling on all counts and refused to issue binding guidelines until it received a record from the Commission embodying not only testimony as to what the teacher said, but also testimony on "the accompanying colorations, the circumstances and other pertinent factors." However, the court noted that a teacher's right to free speech is not an absolute one, but may be limited to protect a legitimate state interest. The court cited Chitwood v. Feaster wherein it was held that if a teacher cannot or does not work cooperatively and harmoniously with the head of the department, but "undertakes to seize the authority and prerogatives of the department head" by means of verbal noncooperation and aggression, he is not protected by the First Amendment and is not immune from dismissal. (Winston v. Board of Education, Borough of South Plainfield, New Jersey Supreme Court, May 13, 1974.)

NEW YORK

Teachers' Strike Penalty and Back Pay Grievance Resolved

Clarification of strike penalty and the procedures for recovery of back pay through the grievance process were established in two separate proceedings by the appellate division of the New York State Supreme Court.

In a case brought by the Yonkers Federation of Teachers against the state PERB, the court upheld a PERB decision which revoked the dues checkoff privileges owing to the Federation's violation of the Civil Service Law which prohibits strikes by public employees.

The Yonkers Board of Education had filed a charge with PERB that the Yonkers Federation of Teachers violated the Civil Service Law by striking. The Federation held that the board provoked the strike and forced the teachers to stage the walkout by engaging in acts of extreme provocation."

A PERB hearing officer sustained the board's charge and held that the Federation called the strike because it failed to achieve its bargaining demands during a self-imposed time period. The full PERB then instructed the board to suspend the Federation's dues deduction privileges.

The court determined that the union resorted to the strike as a bargaining weapon after threatening a walkout. Although recognizing that the board's behavior was not very commendable, the court found no justification in the Federation's claim that the school district was guilty of "acts of extreme provocation" and upheld PERB's decision to suspend the union's dues privileges. (Yonkers Federation of Teachers, AFT Local 860, AFL-CIO v. PERB, New York State Supreme Court, Appellate Division, June 25, 1974.)

In a case between the Guiderland Central Teachers Association and the Guiderland Central School District involving a demand for military service pay, the board contended that it was not obligated to grant back pay since the grievance had not been filed within the 20-day time limit established by Section 3813, designed as a protective measure against unnecessary delays which would impede the validity of an investigation.

Because the Guiderland contract did not require compliance with the clause in question, the court determined that adherence to the 20-day limit was not a prerequisite for arbitration. (Guiderland Central School District and Guiderland Central Teachers Association, New York State Supreme Court, Appellate Court, Appellate Division, June 13, 1974.)

Impart of Class Size, Not Class Size Itself, Negotiable

According to the New York Court of Appeals, while class size is not negotiable, its impact is, including proposals to vary the salary and benefits received by individual teachers according to the size of their classes. Therefore, the Court upheld a lower court ruling that the Public Employment Relations Board had made a reasonable distinction between class size and its impact in a case involving the West Irondequoit Teachers Association and the West Irondequoit Board of Education.

During negotiations, the Association had proposed that class size be limited to 20 pupils in kindergarten and first grade, and to 25 in grades 2 through 6, and that increases beyond those limits would require the agreement of the individual teacher affected and the building principal, with disagreements subject to the grievance procedure.

When the board refused to agree to its proposal, the Association filed an improper practice charge with PERB, alleging that the board had failed to negotiate in good faith. The Board argued that class size was not a term or condition of employment, subject to mandatory collective bargaining under the Taylor Law, but a matter connected with "the formulation of primary educational policy." After the hearing officer concluded that class size had nothing to do with "primary educational policy" and had a significant impact on teachers' working conditions, the board requested to have the case reviewed by the full PERB.

Reversing the decision of the hearing officer, the PERB majority concluded that while the impact of class size on teacher workload was negotiable, "the fixing of class size initially was purely the subject of educational policy made in light of the employers' resources and the needs of its constituency."

After a lower appellate court unanimously upheld PERB's decision, the Association appealed to the New York Court of Appeals, contending that class size fell into the same category as length of the school year, which PERB and the state appellate courts had concluded was a term and condition of employment. Therefore, the Association argued, the distinction between class size and its impact was unreasonable.

The Court rejected the Association's contention and ruled that whereas the length of the working year directly affected only the relationship between employers and employees, "class size is a basic element of educational policy bearing on the extent and quality of the service rendered." Upholding the reasonableness of PERB's distinction between class size and its impact, the court noted that while class size itself was not negotiable, its impact was, and teacher bargaining agents could propose, for example, that the salary and benefits of individual teachers vary with class size. (West Irondequoit Teachers Assn. v. Helsby, New York Court of Appeals, July 11, 1974.)

No Subcontracting Occurred When Primary Work of Fired Employees Was Absorbed by Members of the Bargaining Unit

The Pennsylvania Court of Common Pleas held that subcontracting had not occurred when the Mars Area School District eliminated paid teacher aides who were members of the Pennsylvania State Education Association and expanded the number of volunteer aides since the primary work of the teacher aides had been absorbed by the teachers and was not performed by volunteers. Therefore, the court reversed the decision of the Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board which had held that the district had committed an unfair labor practice when it failed to bargain with the Association before eliminating the teacher aides.

The district had employed both volunteer aides and paid teacher aides. Volunteers were assigned to individual teachers to assist them with clerical and tutorial work. Paid teacher aides, who were initially hired to free teachers from supervisory duties in the cafeteria and other areas outside the classroom, were also employed in assisting teachers with clerical and tutorial work and housekeeping.

After salaries of teacher aides became bargainable and were raised, the district, in an economy drive, eliminated nine aides without consulting the Association and expanded the number of volunteer aides.

The Association filed a petition with the PLRB, contending that the district had committed an unfair labor practice under the Public Employee Relations Act by subcontracting the work of Association members without prior negotiation. The district argued that the decision to eliminate teacher aides was a matter of "inherent managerial policy" over which it was not required to negotiate.

The PLRB held that the elimination of the aides was part of an "integral part of a plan to replace union personnel with nonunion personnel" and, therefore, was subject to mandatory collective bargaining under the Act.

Following the board's decision, the district appealed to the Court of Common Pleas, contending that the board's ruling was capricious and not supported by the facts.

The court held that no subcontracting had occurred since the supervisory duties which constituted the primary work of teacher aides was in fact being performed by teachers, and not by volunteer aides. The unfair labor practice charge was dismissed. (PLRB v. Mars Area School District, Court of Common Pleas, Butler City (Pa.) August 21, 1974.)

FEDERAL

Obligation To Pay Union Dues Held Constitutional

The Supreme Court of the United States refused to review a decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals, 2nd Circuit, which held that the power of a union under the National Labor Relations Act to collect dues from employees in a union shop does not constitute an "unwarranted abridgement" of free speech, that employees may not be relieved from the obligation of paying dues on the grounds that the benefits they receive are not sufficiently substantial; and that charges that a union attempted to force employees to join a union and comply with its regulations and orders fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board.

On these grounds, the Court of Appeals had reversed the decision of a federal district court in a case involving two media commentators on contract with CBS.

Under the collective bargaining agreement between CBS and the American Federation of Television and Radio Artists CBS was required to employ only persons who joined the union within 30 days of employment and remained members in good standing. The union constitution gave the executive board the power to expel any member who failed to obey any union order or regulation. When one of the commentators, a union member, informed the union that he intended to resign from membership, union representatives informed him that he would lose his job if he refused to remain a "full-fledged" member. The other commentator was informed by his prospective employer that he had to join the union as a condition of employment.

The two commentators filed suit in a federal district court, asserting that the requirements that they be union members, pay dues, and comply with union orders and regulations, since they were imposed under authority derived from the National Labor Relations Act, constituted "governmental action" subject to constitutional review by the federal courts, and violated their constitutional rights of free speech and deprived them of their property without due process of law. In addition, they claimed that they had no obligation to pay dues since they had not derived any substantial benefit from union membership.

The district court held that the benefits which the commentators received from membership in union pension plans were not substantial enough to constitute an obligation to pay dues, and declared that any provision of the agreement requiring the commentators to remain union members, pay dues, and comply with union regulations and orders was null and void.

The union filed an appeal with the U.S. Court of Appeals 2nd Circuit. This court declined to consider whether the union shop agreement was in fact "governmental action" and assumed jurisdiction on the grounds that its initial examination indicated that the constitutional claims raised were substantial and not presented "solely for the purpose of obtaining jurisdiction."

Having assumed jurisdiction, the Court of Appeals reversed the lower court ruling in its entirety. It held that union dues did not constitute an unwarranted abridgement of free speech, since they were not "flat fees imposed directly upon the exercise of a federal right" and "constitute the employee's share of the expenses of operating a valid labor regulatory system which serves a substantial public purpose," the reduction of industrial strife. Furthermore, the lower court judgment that the benefits which the commentators received were not substantial enough to impose an obligation to pay dues was rejected on the grounds that "there is no rational basis for distinguishing between the degrees of benefit one enjoys as a result of a union's bargaining efforts on his behalf." Finally, the court held that allegations that the collective bargaining agreement imposed compulsory union membership and compliance with union regulations and orders constituted "arguable" unfair labor practices and, therefore, fell initially within the exclusive jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board and, therefore, the district court had no power to adjudicate. The appeals court reversed the district court ruling and remanded it.

The commentators filed a writ of certiorari requesting the Supreme Court of the United States to rehear the case. The request was denied. (Buckley v. Television and Radio Artists, U.S. Supreme Court, December 23, 1974.)

MASSACHUSETTS

Unit of Principals and Assistant Principals Certified

Holding that a party may not relitigate representation issues appearing as objections to an election, the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission (MLRC) certified a unit comprised of principals and assistant principals in the Littleton school system.

The school committee argued that the principals and assistant principals were managerial employees under the state's new collective bargaining law, and thus should be precluded from collective bargaining since any contract negotiated between the parties would be unenforceable.

The union moved for dismissal on the grounds that the appropriateness of the unit was not a proper issue to be raised as an objection to an election.

MLRC sustained the motion for dismissal, ruling that a party may not relitigate representation matters on the pretext of objecting to an election. It indicated that these issues should be raised at the outset of representation proceedings, or in unit clarification proceedings, or as a defense in unfair practice proceedings involving an employer's alleged refusal to bargain.

Concluding, MLRC denied the school committee's objection, and sustained the union's motion to dismiss. MLRC ruled to certify the union as the collective bargaining representative of the employees in the unit. MICHIGAN

Inclusion of Part-Time Faculty in Bargaining Unit of Full-Time Faculty Permissible

The Michigan Employment Relations Commission granted the Kirtland Community College Faculty Association's petition for an election among part-time faculty with the intention of including them in the full-time bargaining unit since both groups performed the same type of work.

Contending that a single unit of full-time and part-time faculty would be inappropriate, the college sought dismissal of the petition.

Upon examination of the college's employment requirements and practices, the Commission concluded that the distinctions between full-time and part-time faculty did not warrant the exclusion of part-time faculty from the bargaining unit. The Commission also observed that the term "part-time," as applied to certain faculty members, might be a misnomer since they taught a full load. Furthermore, evidence indicated that the majority of part-time employees were considered by the employer to have a reasonable expectation of continued employment.

The Commission found that the inclusion of part-time faculty in the full-time bargaining unit was without conflict, and, therefore, an election to that end would be permissible. (Matter of Kirtland Community College and Kirtland Community College Faculty Association, Michigan Employment Relations Commission, November 15, 1974.)

Employee Classifications Having Community of Interest Accrete to Teachers' Unit

The Michigan Employment Relations Commission ruled that media production specialists and clinical assistants have a sufficient community of interest to be included in the Kellogg Faculty Association (KFA).

The Kellogg Community College argued against inclusion of media production specialists since they were staff administrators who exercised supervisory authority in the area of proper media approach and their salary was on an administrative level independent of faculty salary. The college also contended that clinical assistants should not be included because their pay, work shifts, and duties differed from those of unit members.

The Association, arguing for inclusion of media production specialists, pointed out that the specialists did not have authority to hire or discharge anyone in the existing or proposed unit and had no authority to evaluate or recommend anyone to be hired or fired, and that the position was similar to the position of audiovisual coordinator which was already included in the unit. The Association also argued that clinical assistants should be included since their duties were formerly performed by full-time faculty members.

The Commission ruled that media production specialists should be included because they did not supervise other employees, were not managers in the sense that they were instrumental in policy considerations, and generally had a community of interest with other unit members. The Commission also ruled that clinical assistants should be included because they taught students as well as advised other faculty members on teaching and were not supervisory over other unit members.

On these bases the Commission ruled that the two groups of employees could be included in the KFA if the two groups voted for inclusion. (In the Matter of Kellogg Community College, Employer, and Kellogg Faculty Association, Petitioner, Michigan Employment Relations Commission, June 14, 1974.)

NEW YORK

Certification of Union Without Election Held Appropriate

An employer's interrogation of employees as to their union preferences constituted unlawful coercion under the Civil Service Law since the interrogation was not required to determine the majority status of the union and was conducted without "minimal safeguards" such as secret ballot. Certifying a union without an election, by ordering the employer to negotiate upon request was an appropriate remedy when the employer's conduct had prevented the "laboratory conditions" for conducting an election and there was independent evidence of the union's majority status.

A majority of the employees in the Highway Department of the town of Clay indicated their preference for the union by signing authorization cards, which were turned over to the town clerk, who verified the majority status of the union. The town supervisor circulated petitions for employees to disavow the union, and ordered the employees to report during working hours to his office where he interrogated them concerning their union preference. The supervisor again circulated petitions to disavow the union. Some employees changed their minds several times, and several new employees were hired who "quite expectedly" did not support the union. Finally, the employer informed the employees that a raise was imminent and then announced that the raise could not be implemented since it might be interpreted as unlawful persuasion of employees not to join the union.

In response, the union filed a petition with PERB, contending that the interrogation and the withdrawal of the announced raise were unfair labor practices in violation of the Civil Service Law, and since the town supervisor had extended an offer of recognition to the union, the town was obligated to negotiate with the union.

PERB held that an interrogation regarding the union sympathies of employees was legitimate only if its purpose was to determine the union's majority status and if it was conducted with certain minimal safeguards, including communication of the purpose of the inquiry to employees, assurances against reprisals and discrimination, and the use of a secret ballot to ascertain employee preferences. Since the status of the union had been ascertained before the interrogation, and no safeguards had been observed, PERB concluded that the town's conduct was coercive and had the purpose of depriving employees of their rights under the Civil Service Law. The withdrawal of the announced raise considered as "carrot on a stick" action also constituted unlawful coercion under the Act. Finally, PERB ruled that the supervisor's offer constituted de facto recognition, and, therefore, the town was obligated to negotiate with the union.

After PERB sustained the union's charges and ordered the town to negotiate upon request, the town appealed to a state court. The court, while confirming PERB's rulings with respect to the interrogation and the withdrawal of the raise, held that the union had not been recognized and therefore remanded the case to PERB for a decision on sanctions with regard to the interrogation and the raise.

In considering this question, PERB held that an order to negotiate upon request, thereby certifying the union without an election, was an appropriate remedy where there was independent evidence of the majority status of the union and the employer's improper practices were "so disruptive of the election process as to prevent the laboratory conditions for conducting an election," and that the impact of an employer's conduct on the election process was to be determined from an assessment of the circumstances surrounding the conduct.

The majority of PERB, in concluding that the town had prevented the laboratory conditions for conducting an election, took account of the following: (a) The majority status of the union was known to the town. (b) After receiving verification of the union's status, the town had violated the Act by failing to recognize or to refuse to recognize the union, or to request PERB's assistance in conducting an election. (c) Instead the town had made unlawful attempts to pressure the employees into changing their mind. (d) The town's actions had resulted in some employees changing their minds several times. Therefore, PERB ordered the town to negotiate with the union upon request, to cease and desist from improperly interrogating employees, and to inform the employees of its decision by posting a notice in an appropriate location. (In Matter of Town of Clay and Service Employees International Union, Local 200, PERB, September 27, 1974.)

Different Working Conditions Unjustifiable for Separate Bargaining Units

Since the working conditions and special interests of both groups did not justify separate units, a Public Employment Relations Board hearing officer determined that professional and nonprofessional faculty members, represented by the Adirondack Community College Faculty Association and employed by the Warren County and Washington County Adirondack Community College, should be incorporated in a single negotiating unit.

The Association sought consolidation of the professional and nonprofessional units as well as inclusion of certain unrepresented people while the college wanted to retain the separate units for these groups on the basis of difference in working conditions.

Observing that a close community of interest and function existed between the academic and nonacademic personnel, the hearing officer was of the opinion that the group should be represented by one unit. Therefore, he ordered that an election among all the employees be held. (Matter of Warren County and Washington County Adirondack Community College and Adirondack Community College Faculty Association, Public Employment Relations Board, September 4, 1974.)

OHIO

University Must Pay Salary Increase for Doctorate Granted at Institution It Did Not Recognize

Interpreting a contract between Youngstown State University and the University Chapter of the Ohio Education Association, which provided salary increments for completing a terminal degree, an arbitrator held that since university officials had failed to define from which institutions they would not recognize degrees, the decision of a department chairman to approve a teacher's program for completing a doctorate at a Mexican institution was binding on the University. Therefore, the arbitrator directed the University to pay the teacher the salary increment provided in the contract.

The teacher, who wished to complete her doctorate at a Mexican university, disclosed her plans to her department chairman and received his approval. However, upon completion of her doctorate, the University refused to grant her the contractually required salary increase for obtaining a terminal degree before the start of an academic year, on the grounds that the institution which granted the degree was not properly accredited, and the degree was therefore unacceptable.

The teacher grieved, requesting that she be awarded the increase as required by contract, and recognition of her degree in all matters connected with promotion, advancement, and university publications.

The arbitrator held that since University officials had not placed any limits on the institutions they would recognize, the decision by the department chairman to approve the teacher's plan constituted approval by the University which could not be withdrawn. However, the arbitrator noted that he could not modify the contract which left matters concerning advancement, promotion, and University publications within the discretion of the University. Therefore, he confined his award to what was stipulated by the contract, and directed the University to pay the salary increase. WISCONSIN

Inquiry into Reason for Requesting Personal Leave Held Permissible Where Contract Does Not Prohibit It

An examiner of the Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission ruled that furtherance of an outside business interest was not a reason for granting personal leave under a contract that provided for leave for unavoidable reasons connected with "personal business." In addition, the examiner held that in the absence of contract language expressly prohibiting inquiry into the reasons for requesting personal leave, such inquiry was a proper exercise of administrative authority when leave was requested for the opening days of school. However, the examiner ruled that teachers who, after giving notice of their intent, had taken leave without pay in the absence of a direct order not to do so, had been improperly suspended. Therefore, the examiner ordered the Whitewater Unified School District to pay the teachers for the days they were suspended and to remove from their files all correspondence connected with the suspension.

The two teachers had requested two days' personal leave under a contract which provided for the use of two days of sick leave as personal leave days for the conduct of personal business which could not be conducted on other than a school day, but only for "sound, pressing, and unavoidable reasons." When the teachers informed their supervisor, at his request, that the purpose of their leave was to purchase a valuable horse for their outside horse-raising business, and that if necessary they would take leave without pay, the administrator informed them that personal leave was not available for that purpose, and said that he would not approve the payment of their salary for the two days in question.

Following this conversation, the administrator informed the elementary school where one of the teachers worked that she might be absent and the principal distributed a memorandum to the faculty to inform them and stated that in this event, her classes would be covered by existing staff and no lesson plans would be required.

However, when the two teachers returned from leave, they were suspended without pay for 2½ days for failing to inform the administrator that they were definitely planning to be absent and for failing to file lesson plans.

In response, after filing and processing a grievance, the teachers and their Association filed a petition before WERC, alleging that the district had violated the contract by refusing to grant personal leave. The contract did not specifically give the administrator the right to inquire into the reason for personal leave, and past practice was to grant leave without such inquiry. Therefore, both contract language and past practice of the administration in granting leave for such reasons as attendance at family weddings, funerals, and the installation of a carpet at a teacher's home, supported their right to take personal leave for the purpose in question. In addition, the teachers contended that their suspension was in violation of the Municipal Employment Relations Act, since they had followed established procedure for taking personal leave. Therefore, they requested the Commission to order the district to remove all evidence of the suspension from their files and to pay their salary for two days of leave and the subsequent 2½ days of suspension.

In reply, the district contended that (a) in the absence of contract language prohibiting an inquiry, the inquiry was a proper exercise of administrative responsibility under the management rights clause; (b) the language of the personal leave provision did not permit personal leave to be used for the purpose of pursuing an outside business interest; and (c) the suspension was justified by the failure of the teachers to notify the administration that they would be absent and subsequent failure to file lesson plans.

With respect to the issue of personal leave, the Commission examiner held that in the absence of language expressly prohibiting inquiry into the reasons for personal leave, plus the past practice of teachers voluntarily giving their reasons, such an inquiry was a proper exercise of administrative responsibility when leave was requested on the opening days of school, and that the furtherance of an outside business interest did not constitute a "sound, pressing and unavoidable reason" for taking personal leave, since unlike weddings or the installation of carpeting, outside business interests did not constitute personal business.

However, with respect to the issue of suspension, the examiner held that the suspension was improper since the teachers had given notice of their intent and had not received a direct order not to take leave, and, therefore, had not acted in an insubordinate manner.

The examiner ordered the district to grant the teachers pay for the days they were suspended and to remove all correspondence connected with the suspension from their files. (Zordel et al. vs. Whitewater Unified School District No. 1, WERC, December 12, 1974.)

FEDERAL

Employer's Withdrawal of Recognition of a Union Unlawful

The National Labor Relations Board modified the recommendations of an administrative law judge in an unfair labor practice charge brought against Orion Corporation by the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO. The case was brought before NLRB when the employer withdrew recognition of the union after the end of the union's certification year, alleging that the union did not represent a majority of the employees.

The board pointed out that actual employee membership or financial support does not always mirror the total number of union supporters since many workers may favor union bargaining but do not want to be union members. Therefore, the employer's evidence could not sustain its argument that the union no longer represented the majority of the unit.

The Board did not agree with the recommendation of the administrative law judge that the employer be ordered to reimburse the union for litigation costs because the employer's conduct, although serious, was not extremely aggressive or pervasive and not part of a pattern of illegal activity to warrent an unfair labor practice charge also, the employer's defense was not frivolous. Additionally, the Board refused, as a remedy for the employer's unlawful withdrawal of recognition, to order that a new certification year should begin with the resumption of good faith bargaining "since the withdrawal of recognition took place after the expiration of the original certification year and charges stemming from earlier refusals to bargain were barred by the six-month time limit." NLRB Refuses To Exercise Jurisdiction over Private Schools for Physically Handicapped

In two related cases, the National Labor Relations Board declined to accept jurisdiction over private schools for the physically handicapped in Pennsylvania on the grounds that the schools served as adjuncts to the public school system and were essentially local so that labor disputes in connection with them would not have a substantial impact upon interstate commerce.

The cases involved the Overbrook School for the Blind and the Pennsylvania School for the Deaf, and the American Federation of Teachers which had requested the regional director of the NLRB to order a representation election among the full-time and part-time professional staff. In each case, after the regional director of the NLRB had approved the AFT's request, the school appealed, contending that it would be contrary to the purposes of the National Labor Relations Act for the Board to accept jurisdiction.

Reversing the determination of the regional director, the board in the case of Overbrook, took into account that the school, whose students were nearly all from Pennsylvania, was chartered by an act of the state legislature, and was operated under the auspices of the State Department of Education which provided financial assistance, set standards for physical facilities, staffing, and instruction, and utilized the school to meet its statutory obligation to provide educational opportunities for handicapped children of the state who could not be provided for by the facilities of the public schools. On these grounds the Board held that although the school was private in form, it supplemented the facilities and program of the public school system, and that the operations of the school were essentially local so that labor disputes connected with them would not have a substantial impact on interstate commerce.

In the case involving the Pennsylvania School for the Deaf, whose operations were virtually identical to those of Overbrook, the Board applied its ruling in Overbrook as precedent. NEGOTIATION NOTES

FEDERAL

No Constitutional Duty To Bargain with Teachers

According to the U.S. District Court for North Carolina, the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not require a state to enter into a collective bargaining agreement to guarantee that public employees' rights of association and advocacy will be effective. Thus, the court upheld the North Carolina law that declares illegal any agreement or contract between a governmental authority and a labor organization.

In 1967, in spite of the absence of a collective bargaining agreement, school districts decided to give teachers a portion of the school tax as an addition to their salary. In 1972, when the county commissioners terminated the plan over the objections of the Winston-Salem County Unit of the North Carolina Association of Education, the Association filed suit in U.S. District Court, contending that the cancellation was the result of the officials' discovery of a state statute prohibiting units of the state government from entering into collective bargaining agreements with public employee unions. The Association also contended that the statute was unconstitutional since it rendered meaningless the rights of teachers to join a labor organization under the First Amendment by depriving the organization of the capacity to produce the benefits for which it was created. In addition the Association contended that the statute violated the Fourteenth Amendment since it deprived public employees of rights accorded to employees in the private sector, and, therefore, denied employees equal protection of the law.

The school officials argued that the Association had no standing to sue, and had no contractual rights which were affected by the statute.

The court held that the Association had standing to sue. However, ruling in favor of the school officials, the court held that the First Amendment, while providing teachers with the right to associate and advocate, did not require a state to enter into a collective bargaining agreement to guarantee that advocacy will be effective. Since the statute did not violate rights to freedom of association under the First Amendment, the court concluded that the Association had no claim under the Fourteenth Amendment. The court added that unlike bargaining in the public sector, public employee bargaining impinges upon the right of the people of a state to govern themselves since it involves granting public employees "special status and access to the decision-making process" at the expense of other groups. (Winston-Salem/Forsyth County Unit of the North Carolina Association of Educators et al. v. A. Craig Phillips et al.; USDC Mid Dist. N.C., September 17, 1974.)

Teacher Awarded Back Pay for Sex Discrimination

According to the U.S. District Court for Delaware, public-school teachers are covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) as amended by the Equal Pay Act. The Court held that a pay differential between two teachers employed as coaches at a public high school in the Woodbridge School District constituted unlawful sex discrimination, and enjoined the district from continuing to violate the Act and ordered the district to pay differential back wages and interest to the woman teacher.

Between March and May 1973, two teachers, neither of whom had any prior coaching experience, were employed as coaches; the woman was paid $300 to coach the girls softball team, and the other teacher, a man, was paid $400 to coach the boys baseball team. The woman teacher filed a complaint with the U.S. Department of Labor, alleging that the pay differential established by the district constituted unlawful sex discrimination under FLSA.

The Secretary of Labor filed suit in U.S. District Court, requesting the court to enjoin the district from withholding back wages owed to the teacher as a result of the alleged violations of the Act, and from continuing to violate the Act. The district agreed that in the event of its being found in violation, it would pay the teacher a sum equal to the differential plus 6 percent interest.

The court held that the school was covered by the Act since school employees regularly handle and work on goods that have been moved or produced in interstate commerce, and that teachers were covered by the Act as a result of the Education Amendments of 1972 which eliminated the "professional exemption" with regard to teachers. Finally, the court held that coaching jobs were substantially equal since "the actual job requirements. . .viewed over the entire work cycle. . . (1) involve the same primary job functions and (2) require substantially equal skill, effort, and responsibility," and differentials were not warranted since the district had failed to prove the existence of "incidental differences" which "(1) require extra skill, effort or responsibility, (2) consume a significant amount of time of all those whose pay differentials are to be justified in terms of them; and (3) are of an economic value commensurate with the pay differential."

Therefore, the court ordered the district to pay the teacher a sum equal to differential back wages plus 6 percent interest and permanently enjoined the district from violating the Fair Labor Standards Act. (Brennan v. Woodbridge School District, U.S. District Court for the District of Delaware, July 26, 1974.)

Failure To Pay Sick Leave for Absenses Relating to Pregnancy Violates the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and Equal Employment Opportunities Act of 1972

According to a U.S. District Court, failure to pay sick leave compensation for absences related to pregnancy violates both the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Equal Employment Opportunities Act of 1972. Therefore, the South Western City School District was ordered to pay a public-school teacher sick leave and court costs.

The teacher who had been working under contract with the district since 1971 became pregnant during the 1972-73 school year, but continued teaching under the advice of a physician until March 6, 1973, thereby accumulating 43 days of sick leave. However, when she requested the district to apply her sick leave for absences during the last month of pregnancy and certain post-partum days, the district refused her request and instead placed her on unpaid leave of absence on the basis of an Ohio statute which did not include pregnancy as a disability for which a teacher was entitled to use sick leave.

The teacher filed suit in a U.S. District Court, petitioning the court to declare the Ohio statute as unlawfully discriminating on the basis of sex under the Constitution of the United States and the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and to order the district to pay her sick leave for the 43 days she had accrued and used.

However, during this litigation, the Ohio legislature amended the statute to include pregnancy as one of the disabilities for which a teacher may use sick leave.

Therefore, the court, while ruling in favor of the teacher and stating that failure to pay sick leave compensation for absences during pregnancy violated both the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Equal Employment Opportunities Act of 1972, declined to rule on the constitutional issue since the revision of the statute in question had rendered the issue moot.

The district was ordered to pay the teacher sick leave and court costs. (Farkas v. South Western City School District, U.S. District Court Southern District of Ohio, April 8, 1974.)

CSC Computerizes Federal Contract Information

The Civil Service Commission now has in operation a computerized Labor Agreement Information Retrieval System (LAIRS) which will aid the Commission in evaluating current personnel management practices and trends reflected in the texts of collective bargaining agreements between federal agencies and unions of their employees. Currently the LAIRS file has the full texts of 2,600 contracts and has coded 176 distinct elements found in these agreements. Information on these agreements will be updated as new information is received. Additionally, the agreements themselves are indexed and microfilmed "to afford reliable and rapid availability of the full text of the agreements."

To secure access to the computerized data file a keyboard terminal at the Commission is tied into a nationwide computer system called INFONET. An operator types out a request in computer language which is relayed to the INFONET data bank. When the information is retrieved, it is relayed to the LAIRS at the Commission where a computer operator can request the information on a printout. The printout lists contracts that contain the requested information and the page number where the information can be found. The contracts, which are on microfiche, are retrieved and placed in a reader printer which can photocopy relevant information.

Federal Labor Relations Policy Modified

On February 6 President Ford signed Executive Order 11838 which encompasses recommendations of the Federal Labor Relations Council to change the federal labor relations program under Executive Order 11491.

The Council heard testimony and issued its conclusions on 11 different topics. Under the new Order, guards are to be treated the same as other employees for representation purposes since their inclusion in bargaining units would not present a conflict of interest. Sections 7(e) and 21(b), which covered associations of supervisors and management officials, were deleted. However, in its report the Council assured these groups that the Civil Service Commission would "continue to provide guidance on intra-management communication and consultation through the Federal Personnel Manual system" and that the exclusion of the two sections will have no detrimental effect on the two groups.

On the issue of consolidation of existing units the Council recommended that units may merge without an election in order to consolidate "hitherto fragmented bargaining units." However, affected employees may petition for a referendum on the question. Additionally, the appropriateness of the agreed-upon unit must be determined by the Assistant Secretary of Labor. If parties do not agree on consolidation, either party may petition the Secretary for an election on the issue.

The Council recommended that limitations on the scope of negotiations should be issued only at the agency headquarters level or at the level of a primary national subdivision level. The Council viewed this change as an effort to free bargaining from the grip of agency regulations which "have unduly constricted negotiations by reason of the complexity of issuances as well as by the diverse exercise of authority and discretion with regard to the issuance and implementation of regulations dealing with otherwise negotiable matters within subordinate levels of the same agency."

Section 13(a), which mandated that negotiated grievance procedures be limited to grievances over the interpretation or application of the agreement, was dropped and Section 13(d) was changed to give only the Assistant Secretary of Labor the power to determine whether a grievance in a matter is subject to a statutory procedure. However, under 13(d) arbitrators may determine whether a matter is grievable or arbitrable under the terms of a negotiated grievance procedure.

To speed approval of negotiated contracts, the Council recommended that if a contract is not approved within 45 days, the agreement will automatically become effective, subject only to the requirements of the law, the Order, or regulations of appropriate authorities outside the agency.

Changes in Sections 6(a) and 11 now make it possible for the Assistant Secretary to hear and rule on negotiability disputes that arise in the context of unfair labor practice proceedings under the order. A party adversely affected by a ruling by the Assistant Secretary may have the decision reviewed by the Council.

NEW YORK

Common Council's Approval of Policemen's Contract Not Required for Validity

The New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, reversed a Special Term conclusion that a collective bargaining agreement approved by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment and negotiated between the mayor of the city of Utica and its police force association was subject to a requirement under the Public Employee Relations Act that the Common Council approve the agreement before it could be executed.

The Special Term conclusion was based on the determination that a section of the Civil Service Law modified a provision in a minor statute which had vested the power to fix salaries of public employees in the Board of Estimate and Apportionment.

Judging this opinion to be a misconstruction, the court determined that section 204-a of the Civil Service Law meant that any provision requiring legislative action would not be effective until the approval was granted and did not negate the entire contract. If the negotiating authority is delegated to a third party, approval is implied when the parties have reached agreement.

Concluding, the court stated that the policemen's association was entitled to a judgment declaring the validity of the contract. (John E. Creedon Police Benevolent Association, Inc., v. City of Utica, New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, May 23, 1974.)

PERB Opinion Letter

According to Public Employment Relations Board counsel, the payment of a teacher for services not actually rendered does not constitute an unconstitutional use of public funds where such payment is made pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement. In offering this advisory opinion, PERB reiterated the decision in Antonopoulou v. Beame, as Comptroller of the City of New York, in which the court pointed out that because the contract was a legal obligation, it removed the payment from the constitutional prohibition. This, in effect, the court stated, was similar to the Civil Service Law §77, which requires the payment of back pay to a wrongfully terminated employee even though such employee has rendered no services.

OKLAHOMA

Attorney General Opinion

The state attorney general issued the following recent opinions which affect educators' status under collective bargaining.

- A teacher whose present service in a school district consists of less than 3 years of continuous service without tenure and prior employment with the district, not in consecutive years with his present service, is ineligible for creditation toward the probationary period requirement.
- The designation of a professional organization under 70 O.S. 1971, §509.2, during a school year by a majority of the school district's professional educators, for negotiation with the board, continues even after the school year.

WISCONSIN

Court Sets Aside FEP Agency's Charge of Sex Discrimination Under Insurance Plan

A state Fair Employment Practice agency determination that an employer's group insurance plan constituted an instance of sex discrimination by limiting benefits for pregnancy-related disabilities was rejected by the Wisconsin Circuit Court in a case between the Ray-O-Vac, Division of E.S.B. Inc., and the Wisconsin Department of Industry Labor and Human Relations.

The petitioner relied chiefly on Geduldig v. Aiello which held that a statutory system of disability insurance did not violate the equal protection clause of the federal Constitution because it provided lesser benefits for pregnancy disability than for other disabilities.

An employee was denied benefits because the conception of her child occurred during a layoff, a time when benefits for pregnancy were not extended. Because no other disability benefit is denied on account of the time of origin of the condition, the Department found this situation to be a basis for sex discrimination.

Interpreting discrimination under the Fair Employment Practices Act to mean making a distinction in treatment, the Circuit Court determined that the statute signified that as to the benefits of employment women shall be entitled to equal benefits with men. On the basis of the insurance provisions, the Court found men and women insured on equal terms against disability arising from non-occupational injury and disease. The court could not agree that maternity benefits, solely because they are less than benefits for injury or disease, discriminate against women in view of the fact that maternity benefits are provided in addition to those other benefits to which both are entitled.

In regard to the employee being denied benefits because she conceived during layoff, a time in which the insurance was not in force, and no other benefits were so restricted, the court found that the justification for the limited coverage was based on the fact that it was confined to maternity benefits, which are apart from those benefits derived from injury or disease.

Determining that there was no discrimination in the plan, the court set aside the findings, conclusions, and order of the Department. (Ray-O-Vac, Division of E.S.B., Inc. v. Wisconsin Department of Industry Labor and Human Relations et al., Wisconsin Circuit Court, August 7, 1974.)

Medical and Allied Health Workers Organize for Bargaining

Public employee bargaining is spreading in all directions and now is beginning to include the medical professions and allied health fields. Preceded by teachers and state and county workers, the health employees are petitioning for exclusive representation of units at various institutions and are encountering the same pitfalls as teachers.

Recently the Pennsylvania Nurses Association negotiated a contract with Brownsville General Hospital. This contract establishes a base pay rate of $719 per month with increments based on amount of service. Also included is a system of layoff and recall based on seniority, final and binding arbitration of grievances, vacation, sick, and bereavement leaves, and employer-paid health and life insurance.

Affiliates of the American Nurses Association have won elections in Waynesburg, Pennsylvania, and Vancouver, Washington, have obtained National Labor Relations Board elections in Medford, Oregon, and Williamston, West Virginia, and have petitioned for further elections in Pennsylvania. Although the units in Waynesburg and Brownsville, Pennsylvania, include head nurses, head nurses were excluded from the Washington unit and the units in Oregon and West Virginia because the employers contend and NLRB agrees that head nurses are supervisory employees.

Teachers May Receive Summer Unemployment Compensation

The Emergency Jobs and Employment Assistance Act which was signed into law by President Ford contains a loophole which may extend assistance to school teachers on summer vacations. The $2.5 billion alloted for utilization of the Act is earmarked mainly for laid-off workers whose unemployment benefits have been exhausted. However, because under the Act state labor laws will determine eligibility, many teachers on continuing contracts will qualify for payment after 10 months of work even though they get 12 months of pay in 10 months because some state laws allow for such compensation.

The problem was first brought to the attention of federal officials by the State of New Jersey which has the loophole in its state law. However, the New Jersey State Senate will close the loophole with a bill which will disallow benefits for teachers with continuing contracts.

Increase in White-Collar Membership in Unions and Associations Small

The latest report on white-collar membership in unions and bargaining associations covering the period from 1970 to 1972 issued by the U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, indicates that efforts to recruit white-collar workers have produced meager results. The number of white-collar workers affiliated with associations or unions increased from 4.9 million in 1970 to 5.2 million in 1972. During this period the ratio of white-collar workers to total union membership increased only 0.3 percent. White-collar workers represent more than 79 percent of the membership in professional and public employees associations and only 16.5 percent in unions. From 1970 to 1972, white-collar workers on union rolls increased by 81,000 while enrollment within associations increased by 204,000. However, the 85 percent gain in association membership is attributable to the inclusion of 13 additional associations in the Bureau's membership count.

The Bureau cautions that figures on white-collar membership are not precise since the reporting agencies may differ in interpretation of the term. Nonetheless, the survey showed that NEA claimed the highest number of white-collar workers, 1,162,353, followed by the Musicians with 315,000, the American Federation of Teachers, 248,521, the Communications Workers, 243,803, and the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, 238,355.

SALARY SCHEDULE PROVISIONS IN NEGOTIATED TEACHER CONTRACTS

Tasha McGuthrie

A random sample of salary schedule provisions in 1974-75 contracts on file in NEA Research was analyzed for structure and policies. Actual dollar amounts of salaries were excluded. The analyzed provisions are not meant to serve as model items for a "good" salary schedule; however, the information contained will give those concerned with structuring salary schedules an idea of the kinds, frequency, and other related items incorporated in salary provisions of negotiated contracts.

That all of the 193 provisions analyzed contained vertical increments and nearly all (97.4 percent) contained horizontal lanes indicates that the philosophy of the teacher salary schedule is that a teacher's competency is increased through on-the-job experience, training, and/or advanced education. Although horizontal increments are not recorded on the salary schedule in 2.6 percent (5) of the provisions, salary credit for hours beyond the B.A. degree was recognized in these provisions in the form of bonus pay.

Nearly one-half (42 percent) of the provisions provide bonus pay for items not included on the salary schedule. Some contracts provide for additional compensation for earned credits at intermediary points between scheduled preparation lanes. Other contracts provide a bonus which is applied to a specific preparation lane upon attainment of a particular degree. Note the following sample provision that incorporates such a clause.

> *2. Work beyond Master's—two increments of $200 each for each 15 hours of approved graduate work earned beyond Master's degree if fully certified and earned within a period of the last five consecutive years in Queen Anne's County.
> *3. Earned Doctor's Degree—$,000 beyond Master's degree.

Salary indexes wherein all salary steps of the schedule show a relationship to a base factor were included in about 1 of every 5 (18.1 percent) schedules.

Even though only one-fifth (20.2 percent) of the provisions actually state that increments are attained annually either automatically or for satisfactory service, it is likely that they are granted annually unless the schedule indicates otherwise. As shown in Table 2, 1 agreement in 5 (20.2 percent) contains some limitation on granting vertical increments. One limitation which is found in 1 provision in 10 (10.4 percent) is that "satisfactory" service is necessary before moving to the next higher step on the schedule. Of the provisions stating that the increment may be withheld for unsatisfactory service almost one-half state that the teacher must receive written notification explaining why the increment is being withheld. One example of this provision follows.

> Thereafter, teachers whose performance is satisfactory shall be advanced one step on the appropriate salary schedule at the beginning of each successive school year. Before withholding a step increment, a teacher must be notified in writing prior to April 1 in the school year preceding the year in which the step is proposed to be withheld. Such notification shall include a detailed list of all factors upon which the tentative decision is based. The teacher shall have the right to rebut and respond with the assistance of the Association if the teacher so requests.
> [Waterford, Connecticut]

In 6.2 percent of the provisions, annual increments are withheld if the teacher does not earn additional credit within a specified number of years. Note the following example.

> Teachers holding a degree below the Masters level are expected to maintain professional growth by earning at least three (3) credits during each four (4) year period. Such credits shall be semester hour credits or their equivalent, and may be earned through accredited correspondence work, summer sessions, course work at an accredited institution of higher learning, approved travel, or in District inservice courses and curriculum work.

experience credit given varies from two years to full credit. The NEA advocates that full credit for all prior teaching experience be given teachers when they transfer to other districts and having this provision incorporated into the salary schedule should be a "negotiation priority."[1]

Only 3.1 percent of the schedules give more credit for previous district or in-state experience than for out-of-state experience.

Credit for military service is allowed in one-fourth (25.4 percent) of the provisions and 6.7 percent allow credit for volunteer services such as Peace Corps, VISTA, or Teacher Corps. The minimum and maximum amounts of military credit allowed varies, as shown in the following examples.

Military Service

All honorably discharged Veterans, Peace Corps and Vista volunteers with twenty-one (21) or more months of active service will be allowed one additional step on the salary schedule.

Salary schedule credit for military service shall be granted for up to three years on the basis of one year credit for each year military service or major fraction therof.

Clauses allowing vertical credit for work experience, long-time substitute work within the district, and education-oriented travel are incorporated in 6.7 percent of the provisions surveyed. Credit for work experience relevant to the subject taught usually applies to vocational education teachers. The examples below are typical.

Vocational Instructors: For salary scale purposes, 6 years trade experience shall be equivalent to a B.S.. Any years of trade experience from 6 to 10 years will count as one year trade experience for one year of teaching experience and will place the teacher on the appropriate step on the Bachelor's scale. Teaching experience outside the school system shall count as one year for one year until a maximum on the salary schedule is reached. All college credits obtained will be included to place the person on the appropriate salary schedule as outlined in paragraph 1, to a maximum of Bachelor's +24. For any credits required for certification beyond 24, the person shall be paid the total tuition cost of the course.

Certain requirements must be met before reclassification to a higher salary class is made for earned college or university credits (Table 3). The administration must approve the courses to be taken for or toward salary reclassification in 9.3 percent; 5.7 percent of the provisions stipulate that all course credit earned must be related to the teaching assignment or lead to a higher degree. In 12.4 percent of the provisions official transcripts must be filed before adjustment on the salary schedule can be made. Examples of these provisions are:

PREPARATION BEYOND BACHELOR'S AND MASTER'S DEGREES

Any teacher who qualified for additional compensation due to having earned either fifteen (15) or twenty-five (25) graduate semester hours or equivalent in graduate term hours after receiving the Bachelor's Degree, or fifteen [illegible] thirty (30) graduate semester hours or equivalent in graduate term hours after receiving the Master's Degree from an accredited college or university (NCASSC) may qualify for such increases upon presentation to the Assistant Superintendent an official transcript of such credit. Compensation will begin and will be prorated according to the current salary schedule from the day such validation is dated. Such application is to be made within sixty (60) days of completion of work. It is further understood by both parties that this additional training should be related to the current teaching assignment or degree work of the applicant and that courses taken after October 1, 1970, shall be approved by the Superintendent or his designate prior to enrollment.

Pay differentials are based on extra work and/or greater responsibilities. Increments for longevity which extend beyond the maximum step in the schedule are provided in 42 percent of the provisions. These increments are paid either at intervals (for example every five years) or following a specified number of years of teaching services.

Cost-of-living formulas for automatically adjusting individual salaries or generating a new salary schedule on the basis of an increase in the Consumer Price Index published by the U.S. Department of Labor are included in 12.4 percent of the salary provisions surveyed. Note the following sample cost-of-living provision.

SALARY SCHEDULES AND INDEX

For the term of this agreement the salary structure heretofore in effect shall be retained with an increase in the present BA base to reflect an adjustment of 5.5%. In the 1974-75 school year the 1973-74 BA base shall be increased by a percentage equal to the increase in the cost of living for the 1973 calendar year plus 2%. In school year 1975-76 the 1974-75 BA base shall be increased by an amount equal to the increase in the cost of living for the 1974 calendar year plus 1%. The total increase for each year 1974-75 and for 1975-76 shall not be less than the cost-of-living increase in the New York Metropolitan Area for the 1972 calendar year nor greater than that by more than 1.5%.

[Bay Shore, New York]

The survey indicates that an integral part of most salary schedules is promotion, either vertically for on-the-job experience or horizontally for training and/or continued advanced education. The increase in negotiation activity and sophistication of the process is leading to an increase in the number of provisions incorporating pay differentials for directing extracurricular activities. Teacher contracts are beginning to reflect cost-of-living provisions and/or escalator clauses to maintain purchasing power in the face of inflation. Teacher contracts are exhibiting more homogeneity and are slowly moving toward an industrial union model which provides for full compensation for directing any job-related activity as well as the carrying over of experience credit from job to job since such experience directly relates to performance and competency.[2]

BRIEFS OF AGREEMENTS

ASSOCIATION OF PENNSYLVANIA STATE COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITY FACILITIES

Agreement effective September 1, 1974, to August 31, 1977. This comprehensive agreement includes both academic and administrative faculty.

SALARIES

Separate salary schedules are designed for faculty and administrative faculty members, the former providing 6 increments and the latter 7.

INCREMENTS: Negotiations for salaries to reopen September 1, 1975. Failure to agree on salaries and wages to be resolved by a binding determination of an arbitration panel. Annual service increments to be granted on anniversary dates defined by Commonwealth/College regulations and past practice. A minimum increment of $10 per bi-weekly pay period during the acadmeic year or calendar year is to be paid to administrative faculty members. The department chairperson receives a differential of $200 to $750 according to department size.

INCREASE: Salaries issued on the basis of a bi-weekly, 20 pay or a bi-weekly 26 pay system. Salary schedule provides an average differential of 21 percent between preparation levels and 5 percent between steps. The minimum salary for a full-time professor is $18,158, maximum $24,356.80; an instructor, $10,108.80, maximum $13,540. Part-time academic faculty are paid 1/24 of full-time academic year salary for each semester credit hour taught. Part-time administrative faculty members are paid on a pro-rata basis.

OVERLOAD PAY: A faculty member will be paid 1/30 of his salary for every additional credit hour exceeding the 14 assigned per semester or 24 credit hours assigned in an academic year. Student teacher supervisors will be paid 1/45 of the academic year salary for each student-teacher assigned to him/her in excess of 45. Librarians will be paid at the straight-time hourly rate.

PROMOTIONS

PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT AND EVALUATION: Each department selects an evaluation committee, excluding the department chairperson. Nontenure academic faculty members will meet with the evaluation committee at the beginning of the first semester of employment to discuss the evaluation procedure. Two observations per academic term for each nontenured faculty member will be made during the probationary period with at least one made by the department chairperson. The procedure includes a written critique of each observation for improvement and suggestions, with the nontenured faculty member receiving a copy. The parties discuss the critique and sign all copies, indicating that a conference has been held. A signed copy, along with any comments, is placed in the faculty member's personnel file. Tenure academic faculty follow the same evaluation procedure as nontenured academic faculty but will be observed once each academic year, or more frequently, if warranted, and evaluated once every 3 years. Nontenured administrative faculty members will receive a review of performance of their duties at least twice each term during probation and must discuss their disagreements with their managers. Tenured administrative faculty will have one annual performance review, or more if warranted, and be evaluated every 3 years.

RENEWAL AND DISMISSAL: Nonrenewal of nontenured academic and administrative faculty members can be effected only through separate evaluations prepared by the department or administrative committee and the department chairperson or supervisor. A summary of the student evaluations must accompany the evaluation reports. The nontenured faculty member must sign all evaluation copies and may attach a reply in the event of disagreement and discuss such disagreements with the appropriate administrators before the evaluation is forwarded to the college president. First-year nontenured faculty members, if denied renewal, will receive a written statement if they request it. The president's decision will be final and binding, and faculty members will have no recourse to the grievance procedure and/or arbitration. Second-year nontenured faculty members will not be denied renewal without just cause. Faculty members beyond the second year of nontenure must be notified no later than May 31 of the third year, if the fourth year is to be a terminal year. Tenure faculty members may be terminated only for just cause.

PROMOTION PROCEDURE: A college-wide promotion committee will include no more than one member from any one department. The president from each college will grant promotions only if approved by the standards and procedures for each college. Each college-wide promotion committee will prepare a precise statement of the promotion policy and procedures followed by the president's presentation of the statement to an ad hoc committee. The committee must approve procedures and promotion policies before the college may enforce and grant them. Faculty members must meet minimum qualifications, with a written substantiation no later than November 15. Applications are to be submitted first to the department committee which will submit the full list of applications together with recommendations to the college-wide promotion committee. This committee will submit the list together with recommendations to the president who will make the promotions. Administrative faculty members have the right to grieve only when promotional procedures are not observed.

DUE PROCESS

REVIEW OF ACADEMIC JUDGMENT: Disposition of a grievance before step 3 of the grievance procedure does not mandate a binding precedent for the settlement of future and similiar grievances.

PERSONNEL FILES: Each college will keep one official personnel file which is to be available for examination by the employee. The official pre-employment file will be discarded at the time of granting tenure. Only the president and his designee are to have access to the official personnel file without the written approval of the faculty member. "Departmental and College-wide tenure and promotion committess shall have access to the official personnel file of any faculty member who is being considered for tenure and/or for promotion who, at the time of application, gives approval in writing."

INDEPENDENT STUDY COURSES: These classes conducted by faculty members must meet the requirements of academic, assigned, credit hours and must have a catalogue listing before the course may be offered. The department must approve the course of study undertaken by the student, and the faculty member may not accept students for more than 9 academic credit hours of independent study per semester.

WORKLOAD

WORKLOAD FOR ACADEMIC STAFF: Twenty-four academic credit hours will comprise the full work load. Fourteen academic credit hours will be the maximum per academic term unless overload compensation is paid. No more than 3 preparations will be assigned without extra compensation. Accrued sick leave may be used for the period a woman faculty member is unable to work owing to the medical reasons certified by a physician. A faculty member will retain all seniority and pension rights that had accrued up to the time of her leave, but these rights will not accrue during the period of the leave.

If possible the teacher who is doing the observing shall submit his observation request form to the Building Principal at least forty-eight (48) hours in advance of the time, date, and place of observation. Visitations to other school buildings outside the school system or within the school system may be approved if arrangements can be worked out between the principal and the teachers involved. These visitations shall be counted in fulfilling the above-mentioned two visitation requirements.

CASE REVIEWS

CALIFORNIA

Employer Cannot Act Before Receiving Recommendations of Panel

Although under the Winton Act, the recommendations of a fact-finding panel are advisory, an employer must consider them before taking final action. The California Court of Appeals so ruled in reversing a trial court decision involving a dispute concerning the Richmond Unified School District's modification of the contractual grievance procedure before the issuance of recommendations of a factfinding panel request by the teacher's union.

The teacher's union sought a writ of mandamus to abrogate the board's decision to modify regulations governing employee grievances, a decision the board had passed before taking action required by the Winton Act for resolving persistent disagreements. One rule dealt with teacher evaluation, which before the board's modification, was subject to the grievance procedure; the other rule, permitting the union to pursue a case even though principals did not wish to continue, was deleted by the board.

The Winton Act requires a public-school official to meet and confer with representatives of certificated employee organizations upon request with regard to all matters relating to employment conditions and employer-employee relations. The Act stipulates that parties shall refer any persistent disagreement to a committee of three persons.

While the board was not bound by the findings of the panel and could reach a result contrary to the recommendations of the committee, the appeals court reasoned that to do so without considering the committee's recommendations would render useless the statutory device for the consideration of persistent disputes. Likewise, this reasoning could apply to the "meet and confer" requirements and thus hinder the purpose of the Winton Act.

The board argued that it could still consider the recommendations of the committee after it had acted and then alter its action. The appeals court held that the legislature did not intend that the hearing of the committee's recommendations and findings precede a final decision of the board. The appeals court, however, stated that the legislature's use of the word "shall" rendered the provisions of the Winton Act mandatory rather than permissive.

To the board's reasoning that such a statute would place the legislature in a position of requiring a futile procedure, the court responded that in accordance with the rules of statutory construction, statutes are to be given reasonable interpretations to avoid absurd results stemming from literal interpretations which may render the purpose of the statute useless (Brodsky v. Seaboard Realty Co.). On the board's contention the trial court had ruled that the procedure sought by the teacher's union could obstruct the board's management of the schools. The appeals court, however, observed that the circumstances surrounding the case did not meet the requirements of an emergency which could result in irreparable damage and for which a hasty decision on the part of the board would be in order. The appeals court determined that factfinding and recommendations should precede the decision of the employer and that such a procedure could not be construed as prohibiting the employer from making the final decision. Only if the sequence acted to prohibit the employer from making a final decision would the sequence be required to yield.

The court of appeals ordered the trial court to issue the writ of mandamus sought by the teacher's union, and the board to comply with the procedures set forth under the Winton Act. (Certificated Employees Council of the Richmond Unified School District et al, v. Richmond Unified School District, California Court of Appeals, November 25, 1974.)

HAWAII

Court Clarifies Interpretation of "Impasse"

In a question over the proper construction of the statutory term "impasse," the Hawaii Supreme Court upheld a lower court interpretation of the term as the failure of a public employer and an exclusive representative to achieve agreement in the course of good faith bargaining.

Recalling the intention of the state legislature in promoting joint decision making, the higher court emphasized such prohibitive practices of the collective bargaining act as refusing to bargain collectively in good faith. Rejecting the Hawaii State Teachers Association construction of impasse as the failure of a public employer and exclusive representative to achieve agreement without good faith bargaining or negotiation, the court stated that such a construction would jeopardize the law on collective bargaining in public employment and permit public employees to strike capriciously and arbitrarily. The court further asserted that HPERB had the sole authority to determine and declare the existence of an impasse.

Concluding, the court sustained the lower court's determination and said that in its opinion the trial court reversed the HPERB order because substantial rights of the board of education had been prejudiced. (The Board of Education, State of Hawaii v. The Hawaii Public Employment Relations Board et al., Hawaii Supreme court, November 21, 1974.)

ILLINOIS

Boards Lack Power To Set Retirement Age

Upholding lower court decisions requiring reinstatement of eight Cook County Hospital employees with back pay, the Illinois Appeals Court ruled that a county commission, in the absence of statutory legislation, had no power to establish a mandatory retirement age.

The commission contended that while it had no statutory authority to set a compulsory retirement age, it had the inherent power to do so, or implied authority by virtue of its enabling act to make such regulations. The commission added that its bargaining agreements with other unions included a mandatory retirement clause.

The appellate court rejected these arguments on the grounds that the act establishing the commission did not include any such powers. The court indicated that in a similar case which invalidated the mandatory retirement program, it had rejected the argument that the board had implied authority from the legislature to set a retirement age. The court acknowledged that some municipal authorities had been delegated limited power to set compulsory retirement, but these statutes specifically delegated such authority. Since the Act in question neither fixed a compulsory retirement because of age nor expressly delegated such authority to the commission, the court determined that the commission lacked authority to impose compulsory retirement.

Concerning the argument that because the commission and unions bargained a retirement age, the forced retirements were valid, the court held that they were invalid for the reason that the law cannot enforce a contract which it prohibits; that is, the act creating the commission clearly defined its retirement procedures, and the provision in the union contracts referring to mandatory retirement age could not supercede the rights conferred on employees under a valid statute. Therefore, the appellate court affirmed the reinstatements and back pay ordered by the lower courts. (Charles Sibley, et al., v. Cook County Health and Hospitals' Governing Commission, Illinois Appellate Court, First District, August 15, 1974.)

MAINE

Union's Appeal from Order Staying Arbitration Dismissed

Finding that the Lake Region Teachers Association initiated arbitration and subsequently withdrew it, the Maine Supreme Judicial Court dismissed the Association's appeal from a lower court order staying arbitration.

The court reasoned that the Association terminated the original arbitration proceeding after the decision of the lower court had been entered and before filing the notice of appeal, thus, rendering moot the question of the lower court's stay of the then pending arbitration proceeding.

The Association originally filed for arbitration with the American Arbitration Association (AAA) regarding a probationary teacher's grievance. The school district asserted that the Association was without right to arbitrate the grievance it alleged and sought to stay the proceeding. The lower court so stayed the proceeding.

After the judgment by the lower court and prior to filing notice of appeal, the Association notified the AAA that the grievance was being withdrawn. Receiving no contrary response after writing to confirm the withdrawal of the grievance, the AAA closed its files on the matter.

Considering the evidence before it, the high court ruled that the Association rendered moot the question it raised—whether a pending arbitration should proceed—by terminating the arbitration proceeding. Accordingly, the court dismissed the Association's appeal. (School Administrative District No. 61 et al., Plaintiffs v. Lake Region Teachers Association, Defendant, Maine Supreme Judicial Court, November 2, 1974.)

MICHIGAN

Under Public Employee Relations Act the Courts Retain the Power To Enjoin Strikes

The Michigan Court of Appeals ruled that the power to enjoin strikes by public employees is not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Michigan Employment Relations Commission, but is a power of the courts. In rejecting the jurisdictional question raised by the Detroit Federation of Teachers, the court noted that a strike was not necessarily inconsistent with the union's duty to bargain in good faith.

Under court order, union officials held a meeting to inform the members of the court order to return to work. Union officials were neither enthusiastic nor used the words "urge" or "recommend" to end the strike.

Having been found guilty of contempt, the union officials appealed to the Michigan Court of Appeals, contending that the courts lacked jurisdiction over strikes since a strike constituted "failure to bargain in good faith" and was, therefore, an unfair labor practice within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Michigan Employment Relations Commission as established in the state Public Employee Relations Act. In addition, the union officials contended that there was insufficient evidence to support a finding of contempt.

The court rejected the union's claim that MERC had exclusive jurisdiction on the grounds that the legislature had not included strikes among the unfair labor practices listed in the Public Employee Relations Act, and had retained a separate provision prohibiting public employee strikes. The courts, therefore, could not assume that the legislature had intended to render the anti-striking statute redundant or to eliminate the historic power of the courts to issue injunctions against strikes by public employees.

The court also noted that it was "surely possible that a union could both bargin in good faith and still strike."

However, the court ruled in favor of the union officials, overturning the contempt citation for lack of evidence since the lower court injunction had not required union officials to be enthusiastic in ordering teachers back to work, to persist in the face of shouts or threats, or to succeed in ending the strike. (Board of Education for School District of City of Detroit v. Teachers, Local 231, Michigan Court of Appeals, Division 1, September 12, 1974.)

NEW YORK

Court Acts on Two Demands To Stay Arbitration for Procedural Defects

In two hotly debated issues involving arbitrability and scope of bargaining, the New York Supreme Court, in a case brought by the Somers Board of Education and the Somers Faculty Association, granted a stay of arbitration regarding the payment of interest on retroactive salary increase since the issue was not covered by the contract, and refused to grant a stay over the issue of past service credit since the grounds for the stay, procedural defects, were for the arbitrator to determine.

The school board alleged that the two demands to stay arbitration were incorrectly started at level two, that the grievances were waived by the failure to observe time limitations, and that several other procedural requirements were not met.

The court held that procedural defects in an arbitration are for an arbitrator to decide and a stay of arbitration cannot be granted by the judiciary.

The court based its decision on Matter of Suffern Distributors Inc. v. Local 153, Office and Professional Employees International Union, wherein questions of compliance with step-by-step grievance procedures, before arbitration, of matters pertaining to the collective bargaining agreement were held to be questions to be passed upon by the arbitrator upon consideration of the merits of the case. Also, in Matter of Arlington Teachers, it was held that a claim that a demand for arbitration was not timely rendered under the provisions of the collective bargaining agreement was for the arbitrator to determine.

Additionally, the court was asked to deny arbitration on a grievance concerning interest payments on retroactive salary increases.

The school board argued that the agreement did not include a provision on retroactive salary disputes and, therefore, that it was not obligated to arbitrate the matter since the agreement must contain those issues which must be the subject of arbitration.

Finding that the effect of the arbitration clause was to confine arbitration to grievances involving the interpretation or application of the agreement only insofar as they were expressly covered by the agreement, the court determined that the arbitration clause did not allow arbitration on any provision in the collective bargaining agreement or on any term or condition of employment.

Recalling that in prior decisions involving labor disputes the presumption of arbitrability extended to the deep-seated issue as to who must determine whether a question is arbitrable, when the arbitration clause is limited and issues not covered by it are reserved to the board, the court assumed its obligation to make a determination.

In regard to the issue of credit for prior service, the court found that this was provided for in the agreement, which signified an interpretation of a provision because the issue rested on alleged procedural defects, matters judged for the arbitrator's determination.

The court concluded that since there was no mention in the agreement concerning the payment of interest on a retroactive salary increase, a stay of arbitration was in order and dismissed the issue of prior service credit. (Board of Education, Somers Central School District v. Somers Faculty Association, New York Supreme Court, July 18, 1974.)

Distinctions in State Law Between Public and Private Employees Are Constitutional

According to the New York State Supreme Court for Suffolk County, distinctions in state law between public and private employees are not unconstitutional per se under the 14th Amendment to the federal Constitution. Those who challenged the constitutionality of a specific distinction must prove that it is not reasonable or necessary to obtain a permissible legislative end. On this rationale, the Court rejected the contention of the Central Islip Teachers Association that the Taylor Law's 30-day time limit for appealing from orders of the Public Employment Relations Board was unconstitutional when the Association failed to meet its burden of proof.

After PERB denied teachers a pay increment on the grounds that the Association's petition was not timely filed, the Association appealed to the New York State Supreme Court for Suffolk County. PERB, in response, requested the court to deny the Association's petition for review, on the grounds that the Association had failed to file within the deadline prescribed by the Taylor Law, which requires a party seeking appeal from a PERB order to file a petition within 30 days after receiving the order. The Association contended that since private sector employees were allowed up to four months to appeal from a decision of the State Labor Board, the 30-day deadline on appeals by public employees constituted a denial of equal protection of the law under the 14th Amendment to the federal Constitution.

The court held that since the federal Constitution does not provide individuals with a right to a government job or prevent the government from imposing reasonable and necessary limitations and conditions on public employment, distinctions in state law between public and private employees were not unconstitutional. According to the Court, the Association had to prove that the distinction in time limits provided for public and private employees was unconstitutional by showing that the distinction was unreasonable or unnecessary to meet a permissible end. Since only a clear violation of the Constitution will justify judicial overturning of legislation because such legislation infringes on protected rights or is a subject category, the court could not question the wisdom of the legislature in imposing different time limits. Since the burden of proof lay not with the state but with the Association to show a clear violation, the Court dismissed the petition on the grounds that the Association did not meet these standards. (Central Islip Teachers Association v. Helsby, et al., New York State Supreme Court, Suffolk County, August 1, 1974.)

PLRB May Withdraw a Complaint Without a Hearing

The County Court of Common Pleas ruled that the Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board (PLRB) had authority under the Public Employee Relations Act to withdraw without a hearing a complaint it had previously issued in order to eliminate meritless charges.

The court dismissed a suit filed by the American Association of University Professors (AAUP) which alleged that the PLRB lacked authority to dismiss without a hearing a charge brought against Pennsylvania State University after a complaint had been issued.

The AAUP had filed a petition with PLRB alleging that the university had committed an unfair labor practice by denying the use of university addressing and mailing facilities to the AAUP in its organizing drive while using those same facilities to conduct an anti-union campaign. The Board issued a complaint against the university which the university, urged the Board to dismiss on the grounds that its conduct was lawful.

Acting under the statutory language of the Act, which vests the Board with authority to "issue" and "amend" complaints, the Board withdrew the complaint without a hearing.

The AAUP filed suit in common pleas court, contending that the PLRB lacked statutory authority to withdraw complaints without a hearing and requested the court to order the PLRB to hold a hearing.

The court held that the Public Employee Relations Act and Board rules "contemplate a screening process to eliminate meritless charges" where "a hearing would serve no useful purpose." In addition, the court stated that an employer was not required "to make its communications systems available to a union which is attempting to organize its employees" as a condition for using those facilities to conduct an anti-union campaign. The AAUP complaint can be refiled if the university's actions truly diminish its ability to reach employees. The AAUP suit was dismissed. (American Association of University Professors, University Park Chapter, v. Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board, Centre County Court of Common Pleas, November 7, 1974.)

VERMONT

Public Employers Not Required To Hold Hearing Before Terminating Tenured Employee If Hearing Is Held After Termination

The Court reiterated its previous position that questions of fairness involving procedural rights afforded by administrative bodies must be examined by the courts even when they were not raised in earlier proceedings. According to the Vermont Supreme Court, public employers are not required to grant tenured employees a hearing before termination, provided they give the employee notice and eventually a hearing after termination. Therefore, the Court denied the appeal of an employee who had contended that the State Department of Highways had violated his rights to due process under the federal Constitution by not granting him a hearing before discharge.

After the tenured employee was discharged from his position with the State Department of Highways on grounds of unsatisfactory performance, he was granted a hearing before the Commissioner of Highways and Personnel Board who confirmed the Department's decision. The employee appealed again, unsuccessfully, to the State Employee Labor Relations Board.

Next, the employee appealed to the Vermont Supreme Court, contending that the state had violated his constitutional rights by not granting him a hearing before terminating his employment. The court accepted his appeal in spite of the fact that he had not raised the issue in any previous proceeding, on the grounds that the employee's contentions raised constitutional questions of a dimension and magnitude that required an answer, and reiterated its previous position that "questions of fairness involving procedural rights afforded by administrative bodies must be examined" by the courts even if they had not been properly raised in earlier proceedings.

However, ruling in favor of the State Employee Labor Relations Board, the Court held that since the government had a right to dismiss a tenured employee for cause, the employee had no reason to be certain of keeping his job, and, therefore, the government could protect its legitimate interest in efficient job performance by postponing a hearing until after an employee was dismissed, provided the employee received notice and an eventual opportunity to be heard. (In re Maher, Vermont Supreme Court, October 1, 1974.)

WISCONSIN

Fair-Share Agreements Held Constitutional

The Milwaukee County Circuit Court held that fair share agreements, which require employees in a union shop to pay an amount equal to union dues as their share of the costs of collective bargaining and contract administration are not in violation of the constitutions of either the United States or the state of Wisconsin. Therefore, the Court dismissed a suit brought by several teachers against the Milwaukee Board of Education and the Milwaukee Education Association.

Under the fair-share agreement between the board and the Association, all employees in the Association's bargaining unit were required as a condition of employment to pay an amount equal to membership dues to the Association as their "proportionate share of the cost of the collective bargaining process and contract administration."

Several teachers sought to have the agreement and the Municipal Employment Relations Act which provided for it, declared in violation of their rights under the constitutions of the United States and the state of Wisconsin and state school statutes respecting tenure and promotion. Therefore, they brought suit against the board and the Association in the Milwaukee County Circuit Court, seeking a declaratory judgment, and requesting the court to issue a temporary and permanent injunction against the enforcement of the agreement with respect to them and other employees whom they represented, and to award damages for deductions from their earnings that were improperly withheld.

The board and the Association, in reply, contended that the court could not accept jurisdiction since the subject matter fell within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission, and the teachers had failed to file a claim with the board or to include the city of Milwaukee as a defendant party.

While denying the claim that WERC had exclusive jurisdiction, the court held that the Municipal Employment Relations Act had not violated the rights of the teachers. Since the Act had been passed after the school statutes, "there is a presumption" that the legislature acted with knowledge of those statutes and that the operation of the Act should be "harmonized" with them. In addition, the court held that the Act was not in violation of the teachers' rights under the constitutions of either the United States or the state of Wisconsin, since the teachers were not required to join a union and their dues could legally be used only for purposes of defraying the expenses of collective bargaining and, therefore, did not constitute a political levy in violation of the teachers' freedom of expression.

Sustaining the jurisdictional contentions of the board and the Association, the court held that the teachers should have filed a claim with the school board as a precondition for suing the board for damages, and that the city should have been made a defendant so that if the Association were insolvent, the city would be liable for damages, since under the contract the Association had released the board from liability. (Gerleman, et. al. v. Milwaukee Board of School Directors, et. al., Circuit Court, Milwaukee County, Wisconsin, December 27, 1974.)

FEDERAL

"Conduct Unbecoming. . ." Unconstitutionally Vague Language

Ambiguous phrases, such as "unbecoming" and "detrimental to the service," were declared unconstitutionally vague in a decision handed down by a Court of Appeals.

Upholding a district court ruling calling for the removal of official reprimands placed in the files of two Milwaukee police officers because they wrote to the city's negotiator, a bargaining proposal concerning standby pay, the court struck down the application of the regulation as unconstitutionally impermissible. The sole question following the city's appeal was whether or not the district court ruling of unconstitutional vagueness was correct.

The court was guided by Connally v. General Construction Co. which stated that "a statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application, violates the first essential of due process of law." In determining whether the rule, "conduct unbecoming a member and detrimental to the service," conformed with the constitutionally mandated "rough idea of fairness," it was necessary for the court to establish whether the regulation created standards which could be objectively interpreted by all concerned.

Finding nothing in the rule which offered a clear explanation of its coverage or limitations, and primarily because such a rule placed restrictions on the policemen's right of due process, the court affirmed the order of the district court and declared that the application of the rule was constitutionally impermissible. (Milwaukee Chief of Police and Milwaukee, USCA 7, August 14, 1974.)

INDIANA

Dues Checkoff for Minority Representative Approved

An Indiana Education Employment Relations Board (IEERB) hearing officer determined that dues checkoff for a minority organization having at least 20 percent of its members desiring a dues deduction did not constitute an unfair labor practice despite the certification of another union as exclusive bargaining representative.

The National Education Association-South Bend, representing the majority organization, filed a complaint with the IEERB alleging that the school-board practice of deducting dues for both the NEA affiliate and the South Bend Federation of Teachers established an unfair practice under the public law. The Association further contended that such a procedure was prohibited in that the law specified that an employer deduct dues only for the certified representative from employees who have so authorized.

Citing a determination by the state attorney general, who ruled that the withholding of dues was permissible whenever a number greater than 20 percent of employees requested the deduction, the hearing officer declared that SBFT met this criterion. In an effort to reconcile the differences between the seemingly opposing statutes that required dues deduction on behalf of the certified bargaining representative and that allowed deductions for any organization which could verify a membership of over 20 percent, the hearing officer stated that exclusive representation cannot operate as "a bar" to deductions for the minority body.

The charges of unfair labor practice filed against the school district for deducting dues for both organizations were dismissed. (H. Allen Maxwell et al., and South Bend Community School Corp. and South Bend Federation of Teachers, Indiana Education Employment Relations Board, November 18, 1974.)

MASSACHUSETTS

Breakup of School Bargaining Unit into Teachers and Administrators Ordered

Following its traditional policy of establishing a separate unit for administrators and supervisors, where their number is large enough to allow them to bargain effectively in a separate unit, and where including them in a mixed unit would create conflicts of interest within that unit, the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission broke up an over-all unit represented by the Chicopee Educators Association into a classroom teacher unit and an administrators unit. Department heads were placed in the administrators unit on the grounds that most of their working time was spent supervising and evaluating applicants for positions in their departments. Employees in the classroom teacher unit were to choose between the Association and the Chicopee Federation of Teachers, and employees in the administrators unit were to choose between the Association and no representative.

The Chicopee School Committee had recognized the Association as the representative of a bargaining unit which had not been certified by the Commission, and included principals, vice-principals, directors, department heads, and school psychologists in addition to teachers, counselors, counselor examiners, librarians, and an instructional media specialist.

The Federation filed a petition with the Commission, challenging the appropriateness of the unit and requesting the Commission to order a representation election in a revised unit which excluded administrators, department heads, and school psychologists. The Association contended that the existing unit was appropriate, and requested that no elections be held.

The Commission followed its practice of establishing a separate administrative unit for supervisory employees where their number was large enough to allow them to bargain effectively in a separate unit and where including them in a mixed unit with teachers would create conflicts of interest within the unit. The Commission ruled that department heads were supervisors since they spent most of their working time supervising teachers or evaluating applicants for positions in their departments, and their judgments carried equal weight with those of other supervisors. On the other hand, the Commission held that other positions which had different educational requirements but which carried working conditions, wages, and hours similar to those of teachers could be included with teachers in a single bargaining unit.

Therefore, the Commission established two separate units: the Classroom Teacher Unit which had been requested by the Federation, and a separate Administrators Unit consisting of all principals, vice-principals, directors, assistant directors, supervisors, department heads, and school psychologists, but excluding managerial and confidential employees. (Matter of City of Chicopee, School Committee, and Chicopee Federation of Teachers Local 2416, AFT, Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission, November 18, 1974.)

MICHIGAN

Female Employees Entitled to Sick Leave Benefits for Confinement and Recuperation Unless Contract Specifically Exempts Normal Pregnancy

If a sick leave provision does not specifically exempt normal pregnancies, the arbitrator held, it has to be interpreted as covering normal pregnancies and that for purposes of applying sick leave benefits, under such a provision, the period of "illness" begins at the birth of the child and ends when the woman is released from medical care by her physician. The applicability of a sick leave provision to pregnancy is unaffected by the presence of an unconstitutional mandatory maternity leave provision. Therefore, the arbitrator ruled that under the contract between the Reeths-Puffer Education Association and the Reeths-Puffer Board of Education, a teacher was entitled to sick leave benefits for the period covering confinement and recuperation after the birth of her child.

After the teacher in question was advised by her physician to take leave of absence, starting on January 2, 1974, in anticipation of the birth of her child, she informed the superintendent that she was taking leave and requested that her leave be treated as sick leave rather than maternity leave without pay as specified in the contract between the school board and the Association. She cited Equal Employment Opportunity Commission guidelines as the basis of her request. When the Board refused to grant her the benefits she requested, she filed a grievance.

At arbitration the board contended that the teacher had no basis under the contract for requesting sick leave since the contract specifically provided for maternity leave without pay, not sick leave, and while the teacher was unable to work, she was not sick. The Board contended that according to the Supreme Court in Geduldig v. Aiello pregnancy was not a disabiling illness, and that the language of the contract specifically prohibited the arbitrator from modifying its terms.

The Association contended that the teacher was entitled to sick leave under the 14th Amendment to the federal Constitution, EEOC Guidelines, and the Michigan Civil Rights Act, all of which made failure to pay sick leave for pregnancy-related disabilities uniawful sex discrimination.

The arbitrator held that the board had misconstrued Geduldig v. Aiello, and that previous decisions by administrators and the decision of a U.S. District Court in the case of Bravo v. Board of Education required employers to treat maternity leave as sick leave. The effect of Geduldig v. Aiello was to permit an employer, through a negotiated collective bargaining agreement, to specifically exempt normal pregnancies from sick leave benefits. The maternity leave provision in the contract did not constitute such an exemption because as a result of the Supreme Court decision in Cleveland Board of Education v. LaFleur, a board could not and did not require a pregnant teacher to take leave prior to the seventh month of pregnancy for reasons of good taste, and absence for pregnancy had to be considered as absence for illness unless the sick leave provision itself specifically exempted normal pregnancy from coverage. If a sick leave provision contains no language specifically exempting normal pregnancies, a female employee is entitled to sick leave benefits during the period of illness which begins at the date of birth of her child and ends at the date when she is released from medical care by her physician.

Therefore, since the sick leave provision iself contained no language specifically exempting normal pregnancy, the arbitrator ruled that the teacher was entitled to receive sick leave benefits from the date of her child's birth until released by her physican to return to work. Faculty Must Obtain Consent of College Before Engaging in Outside Employment

Requiring faculty to obtain permission from the college before engaging in outside employment, and subjecting the withholding of permission to arbitration were reasonably related to the legitimate objectives of the college, which included ascertaining that there would be no conflicts between outside employment and teaching obligations. Therefore, an arbitrator denied the grievance presented by the Faculty Association of Ferris State College which contended that the college should not require permission for outside employment so long as individual faculty members performed their duties satisfactorily. The arbitrator determined that the rule was valid under the existing contract and could not be changed except by collective bargaining.

The rule was promulgated after the state legislature passed an appropriations act which prohibited institutions of higher education from using state funds to pay employees for time spent working outside the institution without written authorization from the board of trustees, and further required reports of these authorizations to be submitted to the legislature. In response, the President of the College issued an executive memorandum reinstating the policy of requiring faculty members who wished to engage in outside employment to obtain the prior consent of the College.

The Association contended that the memorandum violated its contract with the college which granted administrators the power to adopt "reasonable" policies within the limits of state and federal law. The Association held the rule to be unreasonable because it imposed economic control over the time of faculty members which was not needed to perform college duties.

The College specified that under the rule permission would be required only for outside employment and would be granted as long as there was no conflict of interest with teaching obligations and the individual was satisfactorily performing his duties. Withholding of permission would be subject to the grievance procedure and reviewed by arbitration.

The arbitrator held that the rule, as modified at arbitration, was reasonably related to the legitimate objectives of the college in fulfilling its responsibilities to report to the legislature and in ascertaining that there would be no conflicts between outside employment and teaching obligations.

Therefore, the arbitrator held the rule to be reasonable under the existing contract, but stipulated that any change in the rule must come through collective bargaining. (Ferris State College and Ferris State College Faculty Association, American Arbitration Association, November 2, 1974.)

NEW YORK

Workload Partially Based upon Class Size Is Negotiable, But Submission of Non-Negotiable Demands to Fact Finder Violates Duty To Bargain in Good Faith

According to New York State Public Employment Relations Board, while the presentation to a fact finder of demands which were beyond the scope of negotiations constitutes refusal to negotiate in good faith, a workload partially based on class size was negotiable, and demands withheld from a fact finder at his request were not automatically withdrawn.

During negotiations, the Yorktown Faculty Association requested that the Yorktown Central School District negotiate items which the district contended were beyond the mandatory scope of negotiations. These items included: (a) the district's decision to eliminate jobs; (b) a maximum limit of 22,000 weighted student-contact minutes per week, computed on a basis that included class size; (c) a greater role in decision-making related to curriculum development, the evaluation of principals, and the assignment of paraprofessionals; (d) specific numbers of student-contact periods in various subject areas with teaching specialists; and (e) salary and job assignment of per-diem substitutes who were not in the bargaining unit. In addition to the disagreement over these demands, there was disagreement on a number of negotiable items.

When an impasse was reached, the matter was submitted to fact-finding. At the fact finder's request, certain demands which the district considered negotiable were not submitted for consideration. However, when the fact finder accepted for consideration the Association demands which the district considered non-negotiable, the district, while replying to the demands on their merits, restated its position that these demands were not mandatory subjects for negotiations.

After the fact finder submitted his report, the parties could still not reach an agreement. The Association reiterated its demands, including those which had been withheld from the fact finder.

The district filed a complaint with PERB, charging that the Association had violated the Civil Service Law by insisting that the district negotiate on demands which were beyond the mandatory scope of negotiations, had violated its duty to negotiate in good faith by presenting those demands to a fact finder, and by reinstating after fact-finding demands which had been withheld from the fact finder. Subsequently, the Association also filed a complaint with PERB, charging that the district had unlawfully refused to negotiate over the impact of its decision to eliminate jobs, the salary of per-diem substitutes, and other demands, and had failed to comply with a fact-finder's request to supply financial data.

While sustaining the district's contentions that certain Association demands were beyond the mandatory scope of negotiations, a hearing officer dismissed all of the remaining charges of both parties. Both parties objected to the hearing officer's decision, and the matter was, therefore, reviewed by the full Board.

The Board revised the hearing officer's decision as follows: (a) the Association's demand for weighted student-contact minutes per week was a negotiable item since it was computed not only on class size, but also upon hours of work and numbers of teaching periods which are mandatory subjects of negotiations; (b) the other Association demands challenged as non-negotiable by the district, were beyond the mandatory scope of collective bargaining; (c) since the district had objected to consideration of these non-negotiable demands by a fact finder, the Association's insistence on presenting these demands during fact-finding constituted a refusal to negotiate in good faith; (d) other demands which were negotiable and had been withheld from the fact finder at his request were properly maintained by the Association after fact-finding, since "it does not follow that demands not submitted to a fact finder are automatically withdrawn."

Therefore, the Board ordered the Association to cease and desist from insisting upon a fact finder's consideration of any proposal which is not within the mandatory scope of negotiations, and ordered the district to negotiate on the Association's demand that there should be a maximum limit on weighted student-contact minutes per week. OREGON

Colleges To Bargain as Separate Units

The Oregon Public Employee Relations Board ruled that faculty members of the state's higher education institutions should bargain individually on a campus-by-campus basis rather than as a state-wide unit.

Affecting all faculty and academic members (including graduate teaching assistants) the decision represents a loss for the State Board of Higher Education [BHE] and the Oregon State Employees Association.

PERB's determination was based largely on community of interest since it is at the campus level that employees are selected, appointed, awarded tenure, promoted, and terminated, ranks and salaries are determined, grievances are resolved, and various other aspects of employment peculiar to the institution are considered.

PERB noted BHE's lack of strong central control over each campus, except for budgetary and curricular matters, and pointed out that presidents establish their own policies within the framework of faculty input, general guidelines, and due process requirements set by the Board of Higher Education.

PERB forsees the possibility of lengthy negotiations over what is bargainable, whip-sawing demands, and frequent impasses, but argues that these conditions are normal occurrences for any bargaining unit. It also recognizes that many items can probably be negotiated only with the Board of Higher Education, such as standards for appointment, promotion, tenure, and sabbatical leave.

The overriding reason for its decision, according to the PERB, was that only in single bargaining units can the desires of small institutions be heard. (Oregon State Employees Association v. Oregon College of Education, et al., Public Employment Relations Board, December 16, 1974.)

WISCONSIN

Denial of Sick Pay for Pregnancy Not in Violation of Labor Agreement

Relying on uniform past interpretation of the contract language, a Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission arbitrator ruled that the Merrill Area Joint School District's denial of sick pay to three women teachers on leave for pregnancy was not in violation of the labor agreement.

The Merrill Area Education Association contended that no provision of the agreement granted authority to the employer to deny sick leave benefits, that the clear language of the contract required the payment of sick leave pay for any disability, that the employer was not mandated to determine what was or was not a disability, that state and federal law prohibited discrimination based on sex, and that the state Department of Industry, Labor and Human Relations mandated equal treatment of pregnant women.

The school district contended that the agreement should be interpreted in the context in which it was written and in light of established practices of the parties, that dictionary sources make a distinction between "sick" and "pregnant," thus excluding pregnancy from the sick leave provision of the agreement, that the state of the law on sex discrimination was currently confused, and that the Department of Industry, Labor and Human Relations guidelines lacked the force of law.

Noting that the collective bargaining agreement contains a nondiscrimination clause, the arbitrator pointed out that the provision was silent on the matter of sex discrimination and did not grant him the authority to approach the grievances as sex discrimination cases. Additionally, since the agreement contained no special provision for the granting of maternity leave, the role of the arbitrator was clearly defined as that of interpreting the word "sick" as used in the agreement.

The arbitrator felt disinclined to seek out ambiguity where the language of the agreement was clear on its face. He also underscored federal and state laws as forbidding the continuation of previously existing distinctions between temporary disabilities associated with pregnancy and those associated with other illnesses.

Owing to the current legal ambiguity in the application of the state maternity guidelines and his charge to rule on the merits of each case without interpreting or amending the contracgs the arbitrator looked beyond the contract to previous contracts, and past practice. While prior agreements provided no clarification of the definition of "sick" and the occasions on which sick leave may be used, the arbitrator declared it an undisputed fact that sick leave had been uniformly applied in a manner which excluded absences for pregnancy-related disabilities.

Concluding, therefore, that the term "sick" had acquired an established meaning in the contract and past practice of the parties which excluded pregnancy, he dismissed the grievance. (Merrill Area Joint School District v. Merrill Area Education Association, Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission, November 13, 1974.)

Board Refusal To Arbitrate Extension of School Year Without Compensation to Teachers Prohibited

The Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission (WERC) found that a school board was guilty of a prohibited practice by refusing to arbitrate a dispute concerning its directive that new teachers be required to work two additional days without compensation.

Charging that the Sauk Prairie School Board unilaterally changed the dates for new teachers to start school, two days in advance of the date established in the agreement, the Sauk Prairie Education Association said that the school board owed them additional monies. The board rejected the Association's contention on the grounds that it did not constitute a grievance covered by the collective bargaining agreement, but was rather a clerical error which the board offered to resolve by suggesting that the new teachers use two convention days as time off to rectify the error.

Disregarding the board's proposal, the Association requested a meeting to process the dispute to arbitration. When the board refused, the Association called upon WERC to appoint an arbitrator and hear the grievance.

The WERC examiner found that the school board's initial imposition of 192 contract days violated the collective bargaining agreement and that the board's refusal to arbitrate the issue constituted a violation of the collective bargaining agreement, and as such, represented a prohibited practice within the meaning of section 111.703(3)(a) 5 of the Wisconsin Statutes.

WERC, therefore, ordered the board to cease and desist from refusing to submit the grievance to arbitration and to take affirmative action toward implementing the policies of the statute. NLRB Designates Bargaining Units for Faculty at University of Miami

The National Labor Relations Board approved two separate bargaining units for faculty at the University of Miami: one for the law school and the other for all other faculties except the medical school and the school of marine and atmospheric science.

The American Association of University Professors and the Law Faculty Association requested the NLRB to order representation elections among the full-time faculty, professional law librarians, and professional academic librarians holding faculty rank, and department chairmen who were to be divided into two separate units. The law school faculty was to be represented by the LFA, and all other faculty with the exclusion of those in the medical school and the school of marine and atmospheric science were to be represented by AAUP.

The university contended that either the faculty could not be represented in any unit since they were "supervisory and managerial" by virtue of group participation in faculty governance, or only a university-wide bargaining unit was appropriate. The university stipulated that its proposed unit would also include department chairmen, law librarians, and academic librarians holding faculty rank, in addition to full-time faculty.

The Board held that the faculty were not supervisors or managerial employees since their participation in college decision making with respect to hiring, promotion, salary, and granting of tenure was in their own interests rather than the employer's and final authority over those matters rested with the Board of Trustees. In addition, the Board rejected a university-wide bargaining unit, and accepted a separate unit for the law school on the grounds that the school was physically separated from other buildings and activities on campus, and exercised administrative autonomy, and the faculty worked under conditions different from those of other faculty as a result of the need to adhere to the accreditation standards established by the American Bar Association and the American Association of Law Schools. Finally, applying criteria which had guided its earlier decisions, the Board excluded the medical school and the school of marine and atmospheric science from the over-all bargaining unit on the grounds of geographic separation from the campus, substantial employment in activities other than teaching, such as patient care or research, differences in student-staff ratios and school calendars, non-university funding of expenses, including salaries, which were derived from patient care of research grants, administrative autonomy, absence of prior bargaining history, and the absence of a union demand for inclusion in a broad bargaining unit.

The Board included in the units all full-time employees, other than supervisors, who were professionals holding advanced degrees, teaching classes, or working as librarians under annual contract with the University Division of Academic Affairs, which paid them out of its budget or otherwise substantially controlled their income, and who enjoyed either tenure or all prerogatives and fringe benefits of faculty other than tenure and participation in university governance. Thus, all classes of full-time faculty, professional librarians working as law librarians or holding academic rank, research scientists and program specialists, department chairmen, and associate and assistant deans who held faculty appointments and regularly taught or engaged in similar academic activities in a department to which they were permanently affiliated were included in the bargaining units.

Part-time faculty were excluded since, being ineligible for tenure and not participating in university governance, they had substantially different pay and working conditions and, therefore, lacked sufficient community of interest.

Deans were considered supervisors since they were appointed and paid in administrative rather than faculty categories, had final authority over the distribution of budget allocations, could prevent the faculty in a department from meeting to nominate a chairman, and could reject their nominee. Since department chairmen were regular faculty who taught classes, and could make only recommendations to the Board of Trustees regarding the granting of tenure and promotion, and nominate new appointees to the faculty, after consultation with the faculty in their departments, they were not considered to have supervisory authority. Assistant and associate deans never exercised the supervisory authority possessed by deans, and most of them held regular faculty appointments and taught classes.

Coaches were excluded since they were not employed by the division of academic affairs, and shared no faculty or professional characteristics with the exception of a few individuals who held advanced degrees. ROTC chaplains and instructors were excluded since they were not university employees. Research and training associates, who performed work similar to that of research scientists and often worked under their direction, were permitted to vote, subject to challenge, since many of them did not hold advanced degrees, and the record was not clear as to their status as professionals. (University of Miami and University of Miami Chapter, American Association of University Professors, et al., National Labor Relations Board, September 27, 1974.)

8-hour Day and 40-hour Week for State Employees

MARYLAND

AGO: No-Reprisal Agreements Are Invalid; Penalties for Teacher Strikes Must Be Applied in Every Case

The Attorney General, in an advisory opinion, held that the state legislature in enacting the Teacher Bargaining Law had intended the penalties for striking to be mandatory and applied in every case. The opinion had been requested by the State Board of Education which was hearing a suit brought by the independent United Teachers Guild. The Guild had requested the Board to declare a no-reprisal agreement between the Public School Teachers Association and the Baltimore Board of School Commissioners to be null and void and to apply the penalties. Under the statute, the PSTA would lose its status as exclusive bargaining agent for two years, and dues checkoff privileges for one year.

As part of the strike settlement, the Commissioners and the PSTA had entered into a no-reprisal agreement under which the PSTA would retain both its status and its checkoff privileges. This agreement was challenged by the Guild which filed suit in the Court of Common Pleas in Baltimore, requesting the court to order the Board to enforce the penalties against the PSTA and to negotiate the 1975-76 contract for Baltimore City Teachers with a committee representing the Guild, the Association, and an AFT affiliate which had also participated in the strike.

After the court dismissed the suit on the grounds that jurisdiction lay with the State Board of Education, the Board requested the Attorney General to issue an advisory opinion as to whether enforcement of penalties was mandatory and who had responsibility for enforcement. The Attorney General held that the penalties were mandatory and had to be applied in every case since the deterrent effect of the statute would be diluted if a union could assume that after engaging in an illegal strike, it still might succeed in obtaining no reprisals as a term of settlement.

He added that the State Board had the responsibility for establishing guidelines and issuing orders on enforcement of the no-strike provisions, but that the Commissioners had actual enforcement responsibility, and could appeal the Board's ruling in the courts.

Finally, he suggested that the losing party at the upcoming hearing appeal to the courts since the law did not provide for interim elections, and the application of his opinion would leave the teachers without any bargaining agent for two years, would deprive school boards of a "valuable settlement tool" in the form of a promise of no reprisals, and would have the "incongruous effect" of rewarding the AFT affiliate which had remained on strike after the settlement between the PSTA and the Commissioners.

NEW YORK

Management Must Arbitrate Impact of Program Changes or Negotiate Over Wages and Hours

The Office of Collective Bargaining ruled that the City of New York was within its rights in implementing two productivity programs in the fire department during contract negotiations.

The Uniformed Firefighters Association and the Uniformed Fire Officers Association charged that the city was illegally acting unilaterally when it introduced the productivity programs, and contended that the city's action would result in the firemen working under "less than immediate supervision," forcing them to perform extra-contractual work.

Finding no evidence that "irreparable harm" would befall the employees, the OCB rejected the unions' requests that the city be temporarily restrained from implementing the programs. The Board also found that the majority of the unions' complaints were contract matters which should be more properly handled through grievance arbitration procedures. In regard to the alleged possibility of the firefighters working under less than immediate supervision and the resultant increase in workload, the Board held that the union failed to provide information on the impact of the changes.

The Board determined that the productivity programs were a management prerogative and, therefore, exempt from the status quo provisions of the law. According to the Board the status quo provision was enacted to balance the employee's denial of the right to strike, not to prevent the city from acting upon unbargained managerial prerogatives. To act to the contrary, it said, would have the effect of immobilizing the city in its labor decisions during what is normally an extended period. (Uniformed Firefighters Association and Uniformed Fire Officers Association and New York City, et al., New York City Board of Collective Bargaining, Office of Collective Bargaining, August 20, 1974.)

OKLAHOMA

Attorney General Opinion

Addressing himself to three questions relative to the conduct of bargaining unit elections, the state attorney general held that a majority of the professional educators of a school district was required for the election of a bargaining agent of a professional organization. He also stated that unless there was a statutory provision to the contrary, this election must be conducted by the organizations themselves since employers are prohibited from interfering with employees' free choice. In regard to the question of advance notification of an election, the attorney general believed that proper notice meant reasonable notice of the election itself and of the candidates to be voted on so as to allow sufficient time for school district members to vote.

Research Assistants Lose Bid for Bargaining Rights

Acting on a representation petition, the National Labor Relations Board refused to extend collective bargaining rights to a group of graduate research assistants at Stanford University, concluding that they were basically students, not regular employees of the university. The decision excludes such groups at private colleges from coverage under the National Labor Relations Act. Although units at public institutions, currently under state labor board jurisdiction as in Wisconsin and Michigan, are not affected, the precedent culminates a series of adverse rulings thwarting student workers' efforts to achieve bargaining status.

The research assistants and the Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO, argued that they were carried on the university salary roster and were compensated much like other employees.

The university argued that research services performed by the graduate assistants were an integral part of their doctoral program. Emphasizing their role as students, the university's brief pointed out that research assistants were not eligible for employee fringe benefits and leaves, but could avail themselves of student housing, health services, and recreational facilities.

The NLRB sustained the university's contention, noting especially that salary paid to the research assistants was tax exempt and was not a function of job performance or number of hours worked. The board ruled that they were students, not employees, and thus, ineligible for bargaining rights under the NLRA.

City of Charlotte Ordered To Deduct Union Dues

The U.S. District Court ruled that the City of Charlotte, North Carolina, cannot refuse dues checkoff for Local 660, International Association of Firefighters, while making payroll deductions from employees' checks for other purposes. Although the city consistently refused to collect dues, the union decided to pursue the issue after two life insurance companies refused to sell the union group life insurance for its members because dues checkoff was not permitted.

The court rejected the city's argument that a state statute prohibited checkoff as inapplicable since the issue did not involve contract negotiation. The court reasoned that the city was arbitrary and had no rational basis for refusing dues checkoff. Additionally, the court said the city was in violation of the equal protection clause of the federal Constitution as long as it withheld money from employees for purposes not specifically required by law while refusing to deduct union dues. (International Association of Firefighters, Local 660, et al., v. City of Charlotte, et al., U.S. District Court, Charlotte, North Carolina, September 5, 1974.)

Statute Prohibiting Police Officers from Belonging to Pro- Strike Unions Declared Unconstitutional

The U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, declared unconstitutional a District of Columbia statute which prohibited police officers, under pain of immediate discharge, from joining or affiliating with any organization which "holds, claims, or uses the strike to enforce its demands."

The Board of Labor Relations of the District of Columbia ordered an election in which District of Columbia policemen could choose the Police Officers Guild, the International Brotherhood of Police Officers, or the Policemen's Association as their exclusive bargaining representative. Subsequently, the Police Officers Guild voted to affiliate with the National Union of Police Officers, a division of the Service Employees International Union. While the NUPO constitution prohibits strikes, the SEIU advocates and exercises the right to strike in the private sector. The Director of Personnel for the District of Columbia immediately informed POG that its affiliation with NUPO had placed its members' jobs in jeopardy under District of Columbia law since NUPO was affiliated with the AFL-CIO "whose other affiliates engage in strikes." In addition, the Director of Personnel ordered POG struck from the ballot and excluded from further participation in the election.

The POG and the IBPO, which entered as an intervenor, requested the court to declare the District of Columbia statute an unconstitutional infringement upon its members rights under the First Ammendment to the federal Constitution and to issue an injunction against the enforcement of the statute. The District of Columbia challenged both the jurisdiction of the court and the appropriateness of the three-judge panel, and contended that the statute was required by legitimate state interests which outweighed the employees' rights. These interests included the necessity of preventing strikes by public employees, especially police, and the necessity for maintaining the impartiality of policemen in labor disputes where union sympathies might interfere with the performance of their duties.

After dealing with procedural issues, the court stated that under the First Amendment to the federal Constitution, public employees had protected rights to join a labor union, to advocate the right to strike, and to join others in doing so, and that the legitimate interests of the District of Columbia were not sufficiently compelling to warrant the infringement on these rights by the statute which in effect prohibited public employees from joining any labor union. In the absence of evidence that any member of POG-NUPO or IBPO had failed to perform satisfactorily in a dispute involving a labor union, the mere possibility of an abuse was not sufficiently compelling to warrant the infringement. Finally, the District's legitimate interests in preventing strikes by public employees could be satisfied by legislation prohibiting strikes without infringing on the employees' rights under the First Amendment.

Therefore, on these grounds, the court declared the statute unconstitutional, but declined to issue an injunction since it did not believe its decision would be ignored. (Police Officers Guild, National Union of Police Officers, AFL-CIO, et al v. Walter E. Washington, as Mayor Commissioner of Washington, D.C. et al., U.S. District Court, For the District of Columbia, December 21, 1973.)

Major Collective Bargaining Settlements, 1974

During 1974, major collective bargaining settlements provided for larger wage adjustments than in 1972 and 1973, according to preliminary estimates by the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS), U.S. Department of Labor.

Negotiated wage-rate adjustments for 1974 averaged 9.8 percent during the first year of the contract and 7.3 percent annually over the life of the contract, compared with wage adjustments averaging 5.8 and 5.1 percent, respectively, during 1973. The data exclude gains under cost-of-living escalator clauses.

The 1,171 collective bargaining settlements in the private nonfarm economy affecting 1,000 workers or more each covered almost 5.0 million workers, primarily in the steel, communications, construction, retail trade, apparel, and bituminus coal mining industries.

Wage-rate adjustments in manufacturing averaged 8.7 percent in the first contract year and 6.1 percent annually over the life of the contract. In 1973, wage-rate adjustments averaged 5.9 percent in the first contract year and 4.9 percent annually over the life of the contract.

Adjustments in nonmanufacturing averaged 10.4 percent in the first contract year and 7.9 percent over the life of the contract, compared with 5.7 percent in the first year and 5.3 percent annually over the life of the contract during 1973. The construction industry alone had settlements with wage adjustments averaging 11.0 percent the first year, and 9.5 percent annually over the life of the contract. In 1973, the figures were 5.0 and 5.1 percent, respectively.

Cost-of-living escalator clauses covered 60 percent of the workers under major collective bargaining settlements during 1974 and provided 6.1 percent in annual wage-rate adjustments, excluding potential cost-of-living adjustments under these formulas. Contracts without escalator clauses averaged 9.1 percent in annual adjustments, compared with gains of 4.9 and 5.3 percent, respectively, in 1973.

Settlements reached in 1974 incorporating escalator clauses have averaged salary adjustments of 11.7 percent thus far. These gains include first-year negotiated increases and escalator adjustments effective during the first contract year.

Escalator provisions were incorporated in 164 settlements covering 869,000 workers, marking the largest increase in escalator coverage since the steel and communications industries included escalators in their contracts in 1971. Now, escalator provisions cover about 51 percent (5.3 million) of all workers in major bargaining units.

CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—FEBRUARY 1975

The Consumer Price Index rose 0.7 percent in February to 157.2 (1967=100), the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the U.S. Department of Labor reported today. Increases in a wide range of goods and services, including medical care services, utilities, rent, houses, clothing, fresh fruits and vegetables, and products containing sugar accounted for the rise in the February CPI. The effect of these increases was partially offset by lower prices for meats, sugar, and used cars.

In February 1975, the CPI was 11.1 percent higher than in February 1974. The food index was 8.9 percent, the nonfood commodities index 12.2 percent, and the services index 11.5 percent above their levels of February 1974.

Seasonally adjusted changes

On a seasonally adjusted basis, the rise in the February CPI was 0.6 percent. The increase was the same as in January. The rise in food prices was much smaller than in January, but the increase in nonfood commodities was larger. The CPI rose 0.7 percent in December, and 0.9 percent in both November and October.

The food index rose 0.1 percent in February after seasonal adjustment, much less than in January and the smallest increase in 7 months. The slowdown in February was primarily due to declines in beef, pork, poultry, and sugar prices. Prices of sugar-based products, however, continued to rise rapidly. Prices of most other grocery store foods—notably fresh fruits and vegetables and eggs—and prices of restaurant meals also rose in February.

The nonfood commodities index rose 0.8 percent after seasonal adjustment. Although larger than in either of the 2 preceding months, the February increase was less than increases in the first 9 months of 1974. The new car index, which declined in December and January, rose in February, reflecting higher prices for imported cars. The index for apparel commodities also increased following 2 months of decline. Prices of many other commodities, particularly nondurable goods, continued to rise rapidly. Increases in prices of household durables, however, were smaller than in recent months.

The index for services increased 0.8 percent in February, about the same as in each of the preceding 4 months. Charges for medical care services and utilities continued to rise rapidly in February, while increases in charges for home repair and personal care services were smaller than in recent months, and mortgage interest rates continued to decline.

Monthly changes in detail (not seasonally adjusted)

The index for food purchased in grocery stores—the major portion of the food index—increased 0.4 percent, slightly less than the usual seasonal increase for February. A large part of the increase was due to higher prices for fresh fruits and vegetables, which rose more than seasonally and large increases in prices of bakery products and other sugar-based products. Prices of dairy products also rose. The effect of these increases was partially offset by declines in sugar, beef, pork, and poultry prices. Meat and poultry prices usually rise in February. Prices for processed fruits and vegetables declined slightly. Egg prices also decreased, but much less than they usually do in February. The index for food away from home—restaurant meals and snacks—rose 0.9 percent, about the same as in recent months.

The nonfood commodities index increased 0.7 percent instead of decreasing slightly as it usually does in February. About two-thirds of the increase stemmed from higher prices for houses, apparel, housekeeping supplies, and alcoholic beverages. The increase in the apparel index—which was somewhat larger than usual for February—reflected higher introductory prices for spring items. Prices of most other non-durable goods such as textiles, housefurnishings, toilet goods, drugs and prescriptions, tobacco products, gasoline, and fuel oil also increased. In addition, the new car index rose instead of declining as it usually does in February, and there were increases in prices of appliances and recreational goods. The used car index continued to decline, but less than in December or January.

The services index increased 0.8 percent in February. Almost a fourth of the rise resulted from higher charges for medical care services—both physicians' fees and hospital services. Charges for all types of household services increased except mortgage interest rates. Gas, electricity, and water and sewerage rates rose sharply. Charges for housekeeping services and rent increased. Among other services, there were large increases in charges for auto repairs and dry-cleaning services and in taxi-cab fares. STATISTICS

MEDIAN SALARY FOR ENGINEERS INCREASED 13 PERCENT

The median annual salary for engineers went up by 13 percent to $20,660 during 1971-1973, according to a National Society of Professional Engineers (NSPE) survey. NSPE, however, noted that the increase in real spending power amounted to only 3.4 percent owing to the rising cost of living.

Although the NSPE survey had a 33 percent response rate, the data indicated that 9 respondents in 10 earned at least $13,830; three-fourths earned at least $16,700; one-half earned at least $20,660; one-fourth earned at least $26,670 and 1 in 10 earned at least $35,740.

The highest incomes were in the fields of chemical, aeronautical, aerospace, and petroleum and mining. The highest paid salaried employees were those working for educational institutions, consulting firms, and construction-contracting firms. Engineers in executive-administrative positions and consultants were paid higher salaries than engineers in design, production, and maintenance.

The survey showed a decrease in unemployment for engineers, reporting full employment by 97 percent of the respondents. Industrial engineers reported the lowest full employment rate. NSPE noted that the incidence of unemployment was probably higher for nonrespondents.

EMPLOYMENT AND UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES FOR DECEMBER 1974

The number of unemployed persons rose by 560,000 to more than 6.5 million as of December 1974, as the number employed dropped by 550,000 in December to 85.2 million. The jobless rate reached its highest point since 1961 as it climbed to 7.1 percent.

The number of persons with jobs decreased for the third consecutive month. The December employment decline followed a reduction of 800,000 in November and reduced the number of employed persons 1.4 million below that of September's high mark.

The number of nonagricultural payroll jobs in December was 77.7 million, 675,000 below the November level and 200,000 less than the previous year. The average weekly hours for production for nonsupervisory employees increased in December; however, manufacturing hours decreased.

Layoffs have influenced the increase in unemployment, as the number of unemployed who had lost their last jobs increased by 360,000 to 3.2 million. The total number without jobs increased by more than 2 million since December 1973. The unemployment rate rose 2.5 percentage points during the 14 months following the 4.6 percent low in October 1973. Part of this increase was due to last winter's energy crisis; however, most of the increases came during the past four months as the rate increased from 5.4 percent in August to 7.1 percent in December.

All employee groups were affected by the rise in joblessness. The unemployment rate for adult men increased to 5.1 percent in December, up from 4.6 percent in November; that of adult women increased to 7.2 percent, up from 6.6 percent. Teen-age unemployment rose to 18.3 percent, compared with 17.3 percent in November. Unemployment for black workers increased more significantly than for white workers. While the rate for white workers increased proportionately from 5.8 percent to 6.4, the rate for black workers rose to 12.8 percent compared to the previous 11.7 percent. The jobless rate for heads of households increased from 3.9 to 4.5 percent. Full-time employees experienced a rate increase from 6.2 to 6.8 percent.

Accounting for nearly half the jobless total, workers under state unemployment insurance programs experienced a jobless rate increase to 4.7 percent from 4.3 percent in November and 2.7 percent in December 1973.

White-collar workers saw a jobless rate increase to 4.1 percent in December 1974 with most of the increase occurring among sales workers and managers. Blue-collar joblessness rose from 8.2 to 9.4 percent. The manufacturing jobless rate was at 8.6 percent in December, twice that of December 1973, and construction unemployment went to 15.0 percent, the highest rate since 1961.

Following a November drop, the size of the civilian labor force stabilized at a seasonally adjusted 91.7 million. The labor force increased during 1974 by 1.6 million, significantly less than the 2.7 million increase a year earlier. Although employment increased during most of 1974, decreases at year end left the economy with almost 1.5 million fewer employees in December 1974 than the previous year.

The December drop in nonagricultural payroll employment was basically in the goods producing sector. Employment cutbacks were significant in the manufacturing industries, down 505,000 during the month and down 840,000 from October. Employment in durable goods was down by 335,000 from November to December. Factory jobs declined by 1.2 million since December 1973.

With the 50,000 decline in December, the over-the-year job loss in contract construction was 305,000. Mining dropped 30,000, reflecting strike action.

Retail trade jobs in the service industries declined by 130,000 in December, while other industries in this sector remained the same. Service-producing employment rose by 1.3 million, but was offset by the 1.5 million decline in the goods industries.

Seasonally adjusted, the average workweek for all production or nonsupervisory employees was 36.4 hours in December, an 0.2 hour rise from 0.4 in November. However, the average hours were down 0.6 hour from the previous year.

The workweek in manufacturing went from 0.1 hour after an 0.6 fall in November. Factory hours dropped 1.2 hours over the year. Mining was up 5.3 hours, reflecting a return to regular schedules following the strikes.

Hours worked by production or nonsupervisory workers decreased by 1.3 percent in December compared with a 1.5 percent drop in November. Total man-hours declined by 3.6 percent over the year, with manufacturing showing the most decline as factory man-hours were down 3.5 percent over the month and 10.8 percent from the previous year.

Average hourly earnings increased 0.7 percent (seasonally adjusted) for production or nonsupervisory workers on private nonagricultural payrolls in December. Hourly earnings rose 8.7 percent since December 1973. Average weekly earnings went up 1.2 percent in December 1974 and 6.9 percent above December 1973.

The average weekly hourly earnings increased by 2 cents to $4.38 before seasonal adjustments. Hourly earnings have increased 35 cents since December 1973. Weekly earnings averaged $159.87, up by $2.04 over November and by $10.36 above December 1973.

The Hourly Earnings Index was 165.1 (1967=100) in December, up 0.7 percent above the November level, and 9.2 percent over December 1973. For the 12-month period ending in November, the Index in dollars of constant purchasing power dropped by 2.7 percent.

SPECIAL REPORTS

MAINTENANCE OF STANDARDS PROVISIONS IN TEACHER CONTRACTS

Joseph A. Falzon

Maintenance of standards provisions are generally incorporated into contracts to preserve and maintain the highest minimum level of economic benefits, terms and conditions of employment, and rights and privileges derived from the employment relationship. They may be specified or implied in the contractual agreement, board policies, rules or regulations, or past practice. The provision prevents a reduction of benefits from actual change or change through interpretation of contract languague, board policies, or past practice.

In most teacher school-board agreements, this provision is found under the heading, "Maintenance of Standards" or "Maintenance of Benefits." It is often misappropriately placed under a "Savings and Separability" clause and in some instances in a "Miscellaneous" article, giving the impression that "Maintenance of Standards" is more an afterthought than an integral part of the contract which preserves non-negotiated benefits.

Essentially the maintenance of standards provision is intended to preserve those items that are not delineated or cannot be delineated in detail in the negotiated contract so as not to limit the benefits obtained through past practice found in the meaning of the contract, and that cannot be changed except by consent of both parties.

This analysis of 143 maintenance of standards provisions found in 1974-75 contracts on file in NEA Research examines the provision according to the scope of its application to the contract, board policies, rules and regulations, and past practice.

Each contract was analyzed for four types of protection clauses, either alone or in combination, which would reveal the impact of such a provision on board action to change, alter or reduce any one of a number of terms and conditions of employment which are or have been enjoyed by teachers.

The most comprehensive provision in terms of coverage, incorporated the first two clauses. Each clause acting independently affords broad coverage in terms of a specific time frame, scope of coverage, and impact of coverage. The first clause prevents any change, alteration or reduction in terms and conditions of employment through the adoption and/or implementation of new contract language, new policies, and new rules and regulations or the elimination of any aspect of the employer-employee relationship established in these areas or in past practice. This clause establishes a time reference in relation to the effective date of the contract by focusing on a level of conditions gained through any instrument and freezing those policies, rules and regulations, and practices into the future insofar as they impact on the employment relationship.

The second clause of the provision states that alteration of or reduction in terms and conditions of employment through implication or interpretation of the contract may not be made. This clause effectively limits interpretation of

TABLE 1.—TYPES OF MAINTENANCE OF STANDARDS PROVISIONS ACCORDING TO INCORPORATION OF FEATURES

Provision	Number	Percent
No material change in policies, past practice, and contract/no interpretation of contract to reduce contract benefits or terms and conditions of employment	52	36.4

the terms and conditions of employment so as not to reduce or level off any gains previously enjoyed which are greater than the negotiated norm.

Each of the two clauses may be found alone; however, the majority of provisions included them in combination, thus providing maximum coverage.

Other clauses pertain to the contract or board policies, rules, or regulations that may be changed, altered, or reduced.

The most comprehensive provision bars any alteration or reduction in the contract, board policies, rules, regulations, and past practice, either specifically or impliedly. This type of provision usually combined prevention of elimination or reduction of the actual terms and conditions of employment, including wages, and prevention of withdrawal of any benefits and/or professional advantages or privileges enjoyed by implication. The following example best illustrates this type of provision.

> Except as this Agreement shall otherwise provide, all terms and conditions of employment applicable on the effective date of this Agreement to employees covered by this Agreement as established by the rules, regulations and/or policies of the Board in force on said date, shall continue to be so applicable during the term of this Agreement. Unless otherwise provided in this Agreement, nothing contained herein shall be interpreted and/or applied so as to eliminate, reduce, or otherwise detract from any teacher benefit existing prior to its effective date.

The provision quoted above establishes that all prior policy, and rules and regulations which relate to terms and conditions of employment, i.e., negotiable items, cannot be changed. The language implies that all terms and conditions established by prior policy must be maintained at the highest minimum standard and, in effect, can be changed only for the benefit of the employee. The language of the second sentence further guards against changes through interpretation or application of the contract to board policy and rules and regulations and precludes change except through negotiation; nor can the contract be used to take away employee benefits which are better than those provided by contract.

Variations include references to items which are bargainable to specifically identify those items which are terms and conditions of employment. By listing certain items and/or inserting a separate clause to protect against reductions, elimination or alteration in those conditions, the employer is stopped from instituting changes without negotiation over the impact of these changes. Note the two examples below.

> All conditions of employment, including teaching hours, extra compensation for work outside regular teaching hours, relief periods, leaves, and general working conditions shall be maintained at not less than the highest minimum standards in effect in the district at the time this Agreement is signed, provided that such conditions shall be improved for the benefit of teachers as required by the express provisions of this Agreement. This Agreement shall not be interpreted or applied to deprive teachers of professional advantages heretofore enjoyed unless expressly stated herein.

Maintenance of Standards

> A. All conditions of employment, including teaching hours, extra compensation for duties outside the regular teaching hours, relief periods, leaves, and general teaching conditions shall be maintained at not less than the highest minimum standards in effect in the district at the time this Agreement is signed, provided that such conditions shall be improved for the benefit of teachers as required by the express provisions of this Agreement. This Agreement shall not be interpreted or applied to deprive teachers of professional advantages heretofore enjoyed unless expressly stated herein.
> B. The duties of any teacher or the responsibilities of any position in the negotiating unit will not be substantially altered or increased without prior negotiation with the Chapter.

Both of these examples reinforce the coverage by enumerating items, while clearly establishing the effective "time" and the extent of the benefits being enjoyed. The language clearly states that during the terms of the agreement no changes can be made except those which would benefit the employees since the highest minimum standards must be maintained. The second clause of the second example clearly forbids management to unilaterally change or increase teaching duties without prior negotiation.

All three examples not only insure against changes being imposed, but they also forbid change through interpretation which may result from ambiguity in the contract, board policy, and rules and regulations. This feature pertains especially to "advantages or benefits" if they are above the level specified in the contract and unless they are specifically restricted by the contract. Ambiguous language may be used to implement change or to introduce a new practice which may deprive or place a restriction on employees, for example, the institution of a residency requirement or the requirement that a doctor's note be submitted to verify all illness. In the absence of this feature in a maintenance of standards provision or the entire absence of such a provision, some arbitrators have held that past practice is decisive,[1] but others have held that management has inherent right to impose "reasonable rules" irrespective of past practice.[2]

In a case of record an arbitrator held that the school board was required to continue to pay "supply and demand supplements" which had been granted to three teachers after their hire even though the contract stipulated that the salary schedule was to apply to all teachers and that private arrangements must be consistent with the terms and conditions of the agreement. The contract contained a maintenance of standards provision. Therefore, the arbitrator reasoned that when the school board discontinued paying the supply and demand supplements without the teachers' consent, it deprived them of "employment benefits previously enjoyed."[3]

In sum, maintenance of standards provisions typically contain several features: (a) Coverage is insured for "all" conditions and terms of employment within the framework of the contract, board policies, rules and regulations, and past practice. (b) There are no qualifiers to the scope of coverage. (c) If items are listed, they are prequalified as "included" in the scope of coverage. (d) Prior advantages and benefits gained are preserved against reduction by interpretation and/or application of the contract language, board policies, rules and regulations, and past practice without the stipulation that the benefits will necessarily be continued at pre-existing levels. (e) Most changes are negotiable, certainly all that affect terms and conditions of employment, even if only the impact of the change.

The most comprehensive maintenance of standards clause is not an ironclad guarantee against change in board policy, rules and regulations, amplification, contract/or past practice, for under the management rights clause management has the right to institute an administrative policy, for example, requiring doctor's notes for use of sick leave to curb abuses, if the policy is both justified and feasible to eliminate the abuse. In other words, the change must be applied to the whole class of employees not the selected few who enjoy a particular benefit. In a class grievance where there is inconvenience to the whole class but no individual benefits are reduced or altered, arbitrators tend to uphold management and place the burden on the union to halt the change through the negotiation proces rather than through the grievance process. This rationale, however, works to curb management's desire to institute change, and thus the maintenance of standards works to bring management to the table to "talk" about change rather than to institute change.

Some maintenance of standards provisions consist of only one of the features contained in the most comprehensive type of provision: only protection against any change which may result from interpretation of the contract and/or outright contract revision, or only protection against changes which may result from board policy and rules and regulations. Both have implied reference within the framework of past practice.

Those provisions which bar change in terms and conditions of employment which arise from changes in board rules, policies, and regulations may limit changes to those found in written documents because unwritten past practice is not clearly included in the coverage. Equally, changes may emanate as a result of the interpretation of the contract language as the contract is the controlling factor. In an arbitration decision, the arbitrator decided that board policy is not limited to written documents but covers any "matter within the general province of the Board on which the Board has acted on one or more occasions." Such an interpretation, however, is not generally applied in cases where written policy handbooks exist.[4]

Provisions which restrict change in the employment relationship to the contract terms and conditions of employment do not clearly include unwritten past practice. Thus, a board may change or reduce benefits previously enjoyed by all or by individuals if these benefits are above the level specified in the contract. In addition, most provisions of this type do not incorporate a clause covering "benefits" or "professional advantages" and so a board may implement a policy change within the broad framework of the contract and thereby reduce prior conditions.

Generally, provisions which pertain only to changes in board policy, rules and regulations, or past practice or only to the contract are deficient as they restrict the coverage. In terms of vulnerability, however, the provision that restricts coverage to the contract is potentially the weakest, irrespective of qualifiers relative to negotiating change or consent by both parties, since in the event of an impasse it may allow an unfavorable decision by means of board policy change or by an arbitrator's decision. Examples of the two aforementioned types of provisions are reprinted below. They are deficient in coverage because they do not incorporate all or most of the variables which a school board may act upon to change the working relationship. One striking feature of these provisions, however, is that the clearly stated language thay any proposed changes must be negotiated or instituted only by consent of both parties, leaving no room for interpretation.

Notice of Policy Additions and/or Changes

The Board and/or the Superintendent shall notify the Association President of contemplated new or amended policies affecting the Association or its members as early as practicable prior to the first meeting of the Board to consider such policy. The Board will give the Association reasonable opportunity for negotiating before adoption and/or amendment of policy affecting Association members.

With respect to salaries, wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment, the Board agrees that, insofar as these matters are not covered by this agreement, it will make no changes in its existing conditions concerning them without prior bargaining with the Congress.

Maintenance of Standards

Before the Board or Administration adopts a change in policy which would effect a change in wages, hours, or other terms and conditions of employment which are not covered by the terms of this Agreement, the Association shall be notified in writing that such change is being considered. The Association shall have the right to negotiate upon such proposed changes by stating its desire to do so within five (5) school days of the said notice.

In the event of any dispute as to whether or not a change in policy or practice changes wages, hours or terms and conditions of employment, the question may be submitted to arbitration under the terms of this Agreement and the determination by the arbitrator shall be limited to whether the said change is a term or condition of employment and therefore to be negotiated.

Board Policy

The Board maintains the right to make the policy changes which it deems in the best interest of the District. Anticipated changes relating to terms and conditions of employment shall be brought to the attention of the Association in writing. The Association will have the right to negotiate such changes provided it files a request in writing within ten (10) working days after receipt of said notice.

Existing policies and by-laws of the Board affecting salaries, hours and working conditions not covered by this Agreement of members of the bargaining unit shall not be altered, amended or rescinded unless notice is first given to the Association, and the Association shall be notified before the Board establishes new policies or by-laws affecting the salaries, hours and working conditions not covered by this Agreement of members of the bargaining unit. Within ten (10) school days after receipt of such notice, the Association may request negotiations and, if negotiations are so requested, they shall begin within a reasonable time. The policies and by-laws referred to above are the most recent policies and by-laws of the Board on a particular subject whether embodied in the policy book or in Board minutes.

[Roslyn, New York]

Negotiable Matters Not Covered

Before the Board knowingly adopts a change in policy not covered by this agreement but which affects teachers' terms or conditions of employment, the Board will promptly, but, in no case, later than twenty (20) school days prior to taking action, notify the Federation in writing that it is considering such a change. The Federation will have the right to negotiate with the Board over such proposed change provided that it files such a request with the Board within ten (10) school days after receipt of said notice.

Miscellaneous Provisions

Any changes or modifications in terms and conditions of employment will be made only through negotiations by the Board and the Association.

[Manalapan-Englishtown, New Jersey]

Maintenance of Standards

This agreement shall not cause an individual to suffer any reduction in rights, privileges, salary and/or benefits.

[Sweet Home, New York]

As indicated previously, the thrust of the maintenance of standards provision is to provide the widest possible coverage to protect a teacher against vagaries which may change his employment status in any way. The language used to indicate this scope, therefore, becomes most important in determining how inclusive the provision is.

"Terms and conditions of employment" is the most common term used to encompass most aspects of the employer-employee relationship generally considered proper subjects for mandatory bargaining. (Note Table 2.) Such a term also includes any past practices which may not initially have been mandatory subjects of bargaining but which have become so as a result of common acceptance, clear enunciation, and application as a fixed practice over a period of time.[5]

The remaining terms, "teacher benefits" and "professional advantages" usually appear in conjunction with "terms and conditions of employment", and are intended to prevent contract language from being applied or interpreted in a manner that eliminates favorable individual benefits thus preventing change through contract language.

The differences between the terms "benefits" and "professional advantages" are not clear. According to Black's Law Dictionary, "benefits" is synonymous with "advantage" and is "not limited to pecuniary gains," but "refers to whatever is advantageous, promotes prosperity or happiness." In practice, neither arbitrators nor the courts have determined exactly what is meant by "teacher benefits" or "professional advantages." It is possible that "professional advantages" may be held to include such matters as serving on curriculum and textbook committees, since the courts have considered that giving advice and planning are part of "professional employment." Wages, hours, and insurance, however, may be considered "teacher benefits" which teachers receive as employees rather than as "professionals."

Additionally, many provisions incorporate clauses that require "negotiations" or "mutal consent" prior to the instituting of effective change. There seems to be little difference between "mutual consent" and "negotiations." Negotiation, however, does not require agreement. Therefore, if negotiations reach an impasse, the board may be able to implement changes unilaterally unless the matter is subject to binding arbitration. In that case, the arbitrator rather than the Association and the board decides what changes will take place.

Irrespective of the type of protection offered, all of these provisions contain terms which acting together may broaden or restrict the scope of protection they offer. Within the limits of the law and as determined by the arbitrators and the courts, the amount of protection offered by a maintenance of standards clause is affected by its language.

Educators who receive notice of probable cause for termination of the Supplementary Educator Contract shall have the right of appeal through the District's grievance procedure.

No transfer request will be denied arbitrarily, capriciously, or without basis in fact; no vacancy will be filled by an involuntary transfer if a qualified voluntary transferee is available;

TRANSFER - INVOLUNTARY

Notice of involuntary transfer or reassignment shall be given to a certificated employee as soon as practicable, and except in cases of emergency, not later than June 30 of any given year.

An involuntary transfer or reassignment shall be made only after consideration of voluntary transfers a meeting between the certificated employee involved and the superintendent designee, at which time the certificated employee shall be notified of the reason thereof. In the event that a certificated employee objects to the transfer or reassignment and upon request of that certificated employee, the superintendent shall meet with him. The certificated employee may, at his option, have an Association representative present at such meeting.

A list of open positions in the School District shall be made available to all certificated employees being involuntarily transferred or reassigned. Such certificated employees may request the positions, in order of preference, to which they desire to be transferred. All such certificated employees shall be given adequate time off for the purpose of visiting schools at which open positions exist. A certificated employee being involuntarily transferred or reassigned shall be placed only in an equivalent position, one which, among other things, does not involve reduction in position or in total compensation.

Current personnel will be allowed to apply for promotions before applications are accepted from out-of-district applicants; certificated employees will not be requested or required to perform nonprofessional duties, or custodial functions; each certificated employee is legally responsible for the supervision of his group and reporting conflicting situations to immediate supervisors;

Any certificated employee who does not receive a copy of this agreement from the Board, or someone acting for the Board, shall not be placed on probation, suspended, discharged, nonrenewed, or otherwise adversely affected in his contract status because of his failure to comply with the policy of which he had no actual knowledge at the time of the alleged infraction.

HOLD HARMLESS

The District shall hold harmless and defend each person who is employed as a certificated employee of the District from any and all claims for damages caused or alleged to have been caused in whole or in part by that person while performing his duties as an employee.

The District shall maintain such coverage in the District's liability policy as is necessary to assure that the insuring company waives all rights to recovery from any certificated employee any money paid on behalf of the District and/or employee.

CALIFORNIA

Agency Shop Agreement Held Valid Under Meyers-Milias-Brown Act

The California Superior Court ruled that municipalities were authorized under Meyers-Milias-Brown Act to enter into agency shop agreements in order to make use of collective bargaining in the public sector, thereby fulfilling the "overriding purpose" of the Act. Therefore, the Court refused to grant the request of the City of Hayward to set aside an arbitrator's award which upheld the validity of the contract between the city and United Public Employees Local 390 of Service Employees International Union.

In 1972, the city and the union entered into a collective bargaining agreement which contained an agency shop provision. The provision specifically prohibited coercing employees to join the union, obligated the union to represent all employees in the bargaining unit irrespective of union membership, and required all employees as a condition of continued employment to pay the union an amount equal to arbitrator fees and monthly dues as the "fair share" of the expenses of representation.

After the agreement was signed, the city was informed by its attorney that the agency shop provision was illegal. The city filed suit in California Superior Court in Alameda County, requesting the court to void the entire collective bargaining agreement on the grounds that the agency shop provision was in violation of the Meyers-Milias-Brown Act for public employees, the Municipal Code, and the City Charter.

The city and the union had agreed to submit the issue to arbitration with the stipulation that the arbitrator's award could be challenged in the courts. After the arbitrator ruled in favor of the union, the city appealed to the court to set aside the arbitrator's award. The city argued that the provision violated the Municipal Code and the City Charter because by stipulating that employees could be terminated for nonpayment of dues, the provision created a condition of termination not authorized by the Code or the Charter. In addition the city argued that the agency shop provision was in violation of the Meyers-Milias-Brown Act, because by requiring employees to pay the equivalent of union dues, it violated their freedom of choice.

The court held that the provision was valid under both the Charter and the Code because these allowed the city to terminate employees for failure to observe rules and regulations, and the city was obligated under the agreement to revise its personnel rules to conform with that agreement. With respect to the Meyers-milias-Brown Act, the court ruled that the Act authorized the city to restrict employees' freedom of choice to the extent of requiring payment of dues in order to obtain the purpose of the Act, the use of collective bargaining to avoid the "harsh consequences" of labor disputes in the public sector. The court confirmed the arbitrator's award. (City of Hayward et al. v. United Public Employees, Local 390 of the Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO, California Superior Court, November 15, 1974.)

CONNECTICUT

Mandamus Not a Remedy for Breach of Contract

On an appeal from a lower court, the state supreme court ruled that a writ of mandamus was inappropriate for recovery of back pay due teachers under a contract since the relief could have been obtained through a declaratory judgment or a suit for breach of contract. The court determined, however, that since the contract provided for a salary increment for each year of teaching experience and the contract was extended to cover negotiating time, the teachers were entitled to the salary increase.

The dispute between the Milford Education Association and the Milford Board of Education arose over the language of the holdover agreement. The union claimed that the new contract was identical to the previous one which provided for yearly advancement on the salary scale. The board maintained that salaries were to remain the same as those paid the previous school year and that there was to be no increase as a result of an additional year of teaching experience.

The board initially argued that the union had not alleged sufficient facts to warrant a writ of mandamus, that is, that the union failed to show that the board had a ministerial duty to perform the act requested, that the union had an absolute right to the relief sought, and that the union had no other recourse.

On appeal from the superior court decision, the board contended that the court erred in concluding that a writ of mandamus was an appropriate remedy in such a case as this where the issue was essentially a breach of contract and the judgment of the court was an order which could be administered only in a declaratory judgment.

Finding merit in this contention, the appellate court declared, as in Lahiff v. St. Joseph's Total Abstinence Society, that "the writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy to be applied only under exceptional conditions, and is not to be extended beyond its well-established limits." Quoting from State v. New Haven Northampton Co., the court added, "The writ of mandamus is designed to enforce a plain positive duty, upon the relation of one who has a clear legal right to have it performed, and where there is no other adequate legal remedy."

Recalling the Supreme Court's past practice in its use of mandamus, the court said that mandamus was not the proper remedy to enforce performance of a contract for employment where the compensation, length of service, and duties of the employee are not fixed by statute.

Deeming that it could not allow the union to obtain a trial preference by a claim for an extraordinary remedy to which the union was not entitled, the court concluded that the lower court erred in granting the union's claim for a writ of mandamus.

Concerning the board's claim that the lower court erred in its interpretation of the contract and in its conclusion that the salary schedule provided for yearly salary increases upon the completion of each year's teaching experience, the appellate court, after examining the two extension agreements, determined that they did provide for salaries to be identical to those established in the previous contract.

Thus, the court concluded that there was no error concerning the lower court's determination of the proper interpretation of the extension agreements but that there was error on the part of the court in granting relief through its judgment. The court set aside the lower court judgment but remanded the case to the superior court for further proceedings in accordance with its opinion.(Milford Education Association v. Board of Education of the Town of Milford, Connecticut Supreme Court, January 21, 1975.)

DELAWARE

Grounds for Dismissal of Nontenured Teacher Not Subject of Mandatory Collective Bargaining

The Delaware Chancery Court held that under the state tenure law a nontenured teacher who is dismissed has no right to a hearing and that procedures and standards for dismissal of nontenured teachers cannot be mandatory subjects of collective bargaining or contractual commitment. Therefore, the Court refused a teacher's request to order the district to submit the reasons for terminating her to the last step of the grievance procedure because her dissatisfaction with the board's reasons for dismissing her could not constitute a grievance.

After the nontenured teacher in question was notified that she was to be terminated, she sought to contest the termination through the grievance procedure in the contract between the district and the Mount Pleasant Education Association. The district refused to discuss the issue on the grounds that it was not subject to the grievance procedure; nevertheless, the school board granted her a hearing but confirmed its previous decision to terminate her. The teacher then requested the board to submit the issue to an advisory committee established by contract as the last step of the grievance procedure. When the board refused, the teacher filed suit in the Chancery Court requesting the court to order the district to submit the issue to committee.

The court held that under the Delaware tenure law, the school board was not required to justify its decision not to renew the contract of a nontenured teacher, and, therefore, such decisions could not be subject to mandatory collective bargaining or "contractual commitment," but must remain within the discretion of the school board. Therefore, the court concluded that dissatisfaction with the reasons for termination of a nontenured teacher could not constitute a grievance under the provisions of a collective bargaining agreement.

The court denied the teacher's request. (Newman v. Board of Education of the Mount Pleasant School District, Chancery Court of State of Delaware for New Castle County, September 9, 1974.)

MINNESOTA

State Colleges Must Bargain as Unit

The Ramsey County District Court overturned a Public Employment Relations Board determination that called for separate bargaining units among state college faculty members.

The State College Board had filed a request with the Inter-Faculty Organization asking that the director of the Bureau of Mediation certify IFO as exclusive representative.

The court observed that several statutes and two state attorney general opinions upheld the position that the State College Board was the ultimate authority of the colleges for all educational matters, and that it may delegate authority, and reassume or redelegate its original grant of power. The judge stated that "although there does not appear to be any judicial decision construing the meaning of the statute, it is submitted that the intent of the legislature in declaring that the appropriate unit for state employees shall consist of those employees under the same appointing authority was to include all employees who have common circumstances of employment such as profession and nature of work, salary consideration and terms, conditions, and policies associated with their employment."

The court further noted that bargaining as one unit makes possible better use of human and financial resources. It also observed that PERB had failed to consider the wishes of the parties concerned since four out of five favored a state-wide unit.

Determining that the PERB decision was not supported by substantial evidence, the court ordered a state-wide unit to represent college faculty members. (Minnesota State College Board and Minnesota Department of Personnel v. Public Employment Relations Board, Ramsey County District Court, November 13, 1974.)

NEW JERSEY

State Education Board Must Negotiate Rules Governing Teachers' Outside Work

Guidelines regulating outside employment must be negotiated if they affect terms and conditions of employment, ruled the New Jersey Supreme Court in modifying an Appellate Court ruling. Three education associations charged the state Board of Higher Education with unilaterally promulgating without negotiating with the Association extracontractual guidelines regulating teachers' outside employment because these guidelines affected terms and conditions of employment.

Offering no objection to the original regulations, the associations' college faculties contended that certain additional guidelines impinged upon the terms and conditions of employment and were, therefore, negotiable under the state Employer-Employee Relations Act. To substantiate their argument that the guidelines did not affect major educational policy, as the Board argued, but did not directly affect terms and conditions of employment, thus making it a negotiable matter, the associations cited Dunellen Board of Education v. Dunellen Education Association and Board of Education Englewood v. Englewood Teachers in which the court held that "issues which bore directly on the hours and compensation of the individual grievant teachers were proper subjects of mandatory negotiations."

Accepting the rationale supported by the cases cited, the court ruled that the guidelines, in part, should have been negotiated, because in affecting the work and welfare of the college employees, they encroached upon the terms and conditions of employment. (Association of New Jersey State College Faculties, Inc., et al. v. New Jersey Board of Higher Education, New Jersey Supreme Court, November 1974.)

Payment for Unused Sick Leave upon Retirement Not an Illegal Gift of Public Monies

The New Jersey Superior Court ruled that payment for accumulated sick leave upon retirement did not violate a provision of the state constitution prohibiting gifts of public monies to private persons. The Maywood Education Association and the Maywood Board of Education negotiated a longevity award which would pay to teachers upon retirement after 20 or more years of service in the district "five (5) percent of the unused portion of accumulated sick leave days, as of September 1 of the last school year of employment, times the daily rate of pay established by the existing guide at the time of retirement." Nonetheless, when two employees retired and applied for the award, the board refused to pay them.

The board contended that the negotiated provision was illegal and unenforceable because the Education Law prohibits any payment for unused sick leave. Also, because the legislature did not give express authority to pay school employees for unused sick leave, it logically must prohibit such payment. The board argued that payment for unused sick leave would constitute a gift of public monies in violation of the New Jersey Constitution.

The court pointed out that "the only statutory limitation on sick leave for school employees is that an employee may not accumulate more than 15 days per annum for future use." The court found erroneous the board's reasoning that since the legislature did not specifically sanction payment of accumulated sick leave to school-board employees, the legislature did not intend it. According to the court, the failure of the legislature to specifically include certain groups of employees should be interpreted not as prohibiting such payment but rather as leaving to the discretion of individual public employers within their existing statutory authority whether to compensate employees for accumulated sick leave.

Finally, the court rejected the board's argument that payment for unused sick leave would constitute a gift of public monies and cited to support its position Teachers Association Central High School District No. 3 v. Board of Education, wherein a New York court ruled that payment for unused sick leave was not a gift but a condition of employment or "a form of compensation withheld or deferred until the completion of continued and faithful service." The court also cited New Jersey court decisions wherein the courts ruled that other forms of fringe benefits besides payment for unused sick leave were not violative of the gift provisions of the New Jersey State Constitution to support its conclusion that "compensation paid to public employees, whatever the label, is not a gift so long as it is included within the conditions of employment either by statutory direction or contract negotiation." On the basis of the foregoing the court ordered the board to comply with the negotiated provision for payment of unused sick leave. (Maywood Education Association, Inc. et al, Plaintiffs v. Maywood Board of Education, Defendant, New Jersey Superior Court, Chancery Division, December 20, 1974.)

NEW YORK

PERB Overruled on Sabbatical Leave Matter Pending Appeal

The New York Supreme Court ruled that the Elwood Union Free School District was not guilty of an improper practice, contrary to a New York Public Employment Relations Board (PERB) decision, for refusing to implement a sabbatical leave agreement which had been incorporated in a collective bargaining agreement because the subject of sabbatical leaves was pending appeal in court and the school board's negotiator exceeded his authority in attempting to settle the suit in the collective bargaining agreement.

Believing that a provision in the Civil Service Law barred sabbatical leaves, the school board passed a resolution denying such leaves for the school year 1972-73. Subsequently, teachers seeking sabbatical leave challenged the above-mentioned provision. Later, the Supreme Court ordered and reaffirmed its decision that the leaves be granted.

During judicial proceedings the two parties discussed the sabbatical leave provision and negotiated a collective bargaining agreement, both of which were ratified by the teachers. The school board approved the contract but refused to ratify the sabbatical leave agreement whereupon the teachers organization filed an improper practice charge.

A PERB hearing officer dismissed the charge, finding that the school-board negotiator had no authority to conclude the sabbatical leave agreement without first submitting it to the school board for approval, and that the teachers were aware of his limited authority. The full PERB, however, overruled the hearing officer's decision on the grounds that the employer had not negotiated in good faith and ordered that the sabbatical leave agreement be executed.

On appeal, the Supreme Court modified its earlier decision to a direction that the school board "review and consider" the sabbatical leave provision rather than "grant" leaves liberally since the leaves were not granted as a matter of right under the governing contract as set forth in Matter of Streb v. Board of Education of Union Free School District, No. 1, Town of Huntington.

Judging that the school board's negotiator acted beyond his authority and that the teachers' negotiators were aware of this, coupled with the fact that the school board had not authorized the settlement, the court concluded that the board's refusal to execute the sabbatical leave agreement could not constitute an improper practice. (Elwood Union Free School District No. 1 of the Town of Huntington v. New York Public Employment Relations Board, New York Supreme Court, September 23, 1974.)

PENNSYLVANIA

Department Heads Properly Placed in Teacher Unit

The Pennsylvania Court of Common Pleas upheld a Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board (PLRB) determination that department chairmen were nonsupervisory personnel properly included in a unit of professional employees because the functions they performed did not place them in the category of first-level supervisors.

The Altoona Area School District and the Altoona Area Education Association filed with PLRB a joint request for certification of the propriety of including department heads in the bargaining unit. The school district contended that the department chairmen were first-level supervisors and ineligible for inclusion in a rank and file unit. The Association disagreed. The PLRB included them in the teacher unit.

The question before the court was whether the PLRB decision could be supported by substantial and legally credible evidence and whether the PLRB conclusions and order were reasonable and not arbitrary or capricious. The court considered the definition of "supervisor" under the Public Employment Relations Act: "any individual having authority in the interest of the employer to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward or discipline other employees or responsibly direct them or adjust their grievances; or to a substantial degree effectively recommend such action."

On the basis of this definition and the department chairmen's functions, the court determined that the employees in question were not vested with such supervisory powers, but were teachers who were given some free time to perform certain duties in behalf of the school district. The court further asserted that the department chairmen were so far removed from the decision-making body that they could not be construed as being part of a supervisory team.

The court confirmed the PERB decision and dismissed the school district petition. (Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board v. Altoona Area School District, Pennsylvania Court of Common Pleas, February 7, 1974.)

Lower Court Rulings on Grandfather Agency Shop Clause Sustained

The Pennsylvania Supreme Court sustained a lower court overturn of a Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board decision by finding that the inclusion of a grandfather agency shop clause in an agreement between the University of Pennsylvania and the Teamsters Local 8 constituted an unfair labor practice by broadening the scope of a maintenance of membership provision "in violation of the Public Employee Relations Act."

At issue in the case as originally brought before the Board by a non-union laboratory technician was whether non-union members were required under a successor contract to pay dues not required under the prior agreement, since both parties agreed to extend the old contract until a new agreement was reached. Following the adoption of the new contract, the technician received official union notification that unless she continued paying agency shop fees, she would be dismissed. She paid under protest, but filed a complaint charging an unfair labor practice.

In accordance with Section 904 of the PERA, any provision of an agreement in effect on January 1, 1970, which is consistent with the PERA, but otherwise legal, would continue until the expiration of the agreement. The clause also provided that "parties to such an agreement may continue voluntarily to bargain on any such items after the expiration date of any such agreement and for so long as these items remain in any future agreement." The PERB upheld the technician's argument that the above-cited section of PERA permitted parties to bargain for inclusion of inconsistent terms, but not a more severe security clause than contained in a previous agreement. PERB later reversed itself and entered a final order, with one member dissenting, upholding the union security provision.

On appeal, the Court of Common Pleas reversed the PERB decision and ruled in favor of the technician. This decision was affirmed by the Commonwealth Court.

The present State Supreme Court responded to petitions filed by the union and the PERB which advanced the argument that the strict agency-shop provision of Agreement II was simply a modification of the modified agency-shop provision of Agreement I and that such a modification was specifically permitted by Section 904. The court disagreed with the union-board interpretation of the statute on the basis that no item directly involved the appellee since Agreement I contained only a modified agency-shop provision which did not affect her.

To the union-board argument that the court's interpretation of the term "bargain" was inconsistent with common useage, the court admitted that while "bargain" connotes a "give and take procedure," there was actually no "give" on the part of either party. The court rationalized that "to bargain" meant that the parties could again agree to the modified agency-shop provision. It did not mean that they could enlarge the now forbidden practice to include those not previously bound by it.

The union then argued that the application of Section 904 to collective bargaining agreements which became effective after January 1, 1970, but before the statute was enacted on July 23, 1970, was unconstitutional. Dismissing this argument as without merit, the court declared that the only obligation impaired was that purportedly placed on the technician—that of paying union fees to the union which it contended was not contractual since the technician was not a party to the contract.

Citing Livingston's Lessee v. Moore which held that the enactment of a law impairing an obligation to which there has been no consent cannot violate the contract clause, the court affirmed the lower court decision. (Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board et al., v. Erika S. M. Zelem, Pennsylvania Supreme Court, December 5, 1974.)

FEDERAL

Union Shop Agreement on Federal Property Not Subject to State Law and Not Discriminatory on Basis of Religion

Texas statutes which prohibit union shop agreements cannot be enforced on a federal property because federal enclaves are controlled exclusively by federal law. Also, a union shop agreement does not discriminate against members of religious groups in the exercise of their religious beliefs since the agreement does not require them to "subscribe to any tenets or doctrines of unionism or to engage in any strikes or violence against their employers." The union dues exacted from them as employees under the agreement are merely a "tax" by which they "support the collective bargaining activities" from which they directly benefit.

A General Dynamics plant located on a federal enclave in Texas had entered into a union shop agreement with the International Association of Machinists and Aero Space Workers, District Lodge 776. Under that agreement all employees within the bargaining unit covered had to pay the union a sum of money equal to the dues and initiation fees of the union as a condition of continued employment. Upon learning that the Seventh Day Adventist Church forbids a member to join or contribute to a labor union, two Seventh Day Adventist employees resigned from the union and together with a third employee of their faith filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, alleging that the union shop agreement discriminated against them in the exercise of their religious practice by requiring them to support a union financially.

When the EEOC district director could not resolve the issue, the employees filed suit against General Dynamics and the union in a federal district court, alleging that the union shop agreement violated the Texas Right To Work Act, because it was negotiated and ratified outside the federal enclave, and claiming that they were entitled to be exempted from the agreement under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 since the agreement discriminated against them in the exercise of their religious beliefs.

General Dynamics and the union challenged the sincerity of the religious beliefs of two of the employees and contended that their suit was premature since they had not exhausted the union's grievance procedure, and since EEOC had not issued a notice to sue, a necessary preliminary to filing suit under the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The court found that the employees were sincere in their religious convictions, and held that their suit was not premature since they did not have to exhaust the grievance procedure to assert a statutory right and since the EEOC was not required to issue a notice to sue, but could properly delegate this function to any subordinate.

However, the court held that (a) Texas statutes which prohibit the enforcement and control of a union shop agreement do not prohibit the negotiations leading to it; (b) an agreement enforced within a federal enclave is not subject to control by state statutes since such enclaves are exclusively within federal jurisdiction; and (c) a union shop agreement does not require that they "subscribe to any tenets or doctrines of unionism or to engage in strikes or violence against their employers," but only requires them to pay their share of the costs of collective bargaining, from which they directly benefit.

The court also ruled on a cross-claim filed by General Dynamics which sought to recover from the union the legal fees and expenses it had incurred as a result of involvement in this suit. Under the union agreement, the union was required to indemnify the company for all claims arising from the carrying out of the agreement. The agreement contained no language exempting the union from liability for reasonable attorney's fees and expenses incurred by the company in the process of defense against such a claim. Therefore, the court ruled that General Dynamics was entitled to recover legal fees and expenses. (Cooper v. General Dynamics, Convair Aerospace Division, Fort Worth Operation, U.S. District Court, Northern District of Texas, Fort Worth Division, July 17, 1974.)

MASSACHUSETTS

Employer Not Obligated To Bargain over Curriculum Review Council; Compelled To Bargain over Impact of Mandatory Subjects

Holding that some decisions are fundamental to the basic direction of a corporation, the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission found that a school committee was not compelled to bargain over the establishment of a curriculum council since curriculum review was not a mandatory subject of bargaining.

The case was brought by the Groton Teachers Association against the Groton School Committee when the latter refused to bargain over an Educational Development Council which, under the Association's proposal, would review curriculum and other matters related to teaching before the implementation of any recommendation.

Observing that the proposal did not have an impact on wages, hours, and conditions of employment, the Commission determined, as in Yorktown Faculty Assn., [N.Y. PERB 7,] that curriculum was a managerial function beyond the scope of mandatory bargaining. Nevertheless, the Commission stated that when a decision can be shown to have bearing on mandatory subjects of bargaining, the employer must bargain on its effects. (Matter of Groton School Committee and Groton Teachers Association, Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission, December 17, 1974.)

MAINE

Charges of Refusal To Bargain and Improper Selection of Chief Negotiator Dismissed

The Maine Public Employees Labor Relations Board found no merit in the arguments of the Maine School Administrative District that the Maine School Administrative District Number 43 Teachers Association had unlawfully refused to bargain and that under the collective bargaining agreement the Association could not replace its chief negotiator without the employer's consent. The first charge was made after teachers "in and about" the negotiations area disturbed a negotiations session.

Following this incident the parties agreed to change locations and the Association sent a letter to its members requesting them to stay away from the negotiations area. The second charge was made because the Association appointed a new chief negotiator when the original chief negotiator resigned.

The school district contended that the distraction caused by the teachers during negotiations constituted a refusal to bargain on the part of the Association. The district also contended that according to the agreement with the Association, the chief negotiator on its bargaining team could not be replaced without the district's approval.

The Board found that the agreement between the parties to change the place for negotiations and the memorandum issued by the Association disposed of the allegations of an unfair labor practice and dismissed the charge.

After reviewing the negotiating procedure outlined in the parties' contract, the Board determined that the agreement did not establish that the opposite side must agree on who is selected to be chief negotiator. The agreement provided for a "revolving chair" by which a person not a regular member of the bargaining team, could come into specific negotiating sessions to offer professional advice and comment. The mere existence of this concept, the board reasoned, was an indication that the parties foresaw the possibility of changes in the composition of the bargaining teams. Therefore, the Board ruled that "the bargaining agreement does not limit or prohibit the selection of an individual as the chief negotiator who is not a member of the negotiating team or of the Association." (Maine School Administrative District No. 43 Board of Directors, Byron-Mexico-Roxbury, Plaintiff v. Maine School Administrative District No. 43 Teachers Association et al., Defendants, Maine Public Employees Labor Relations Board, December 12, 1974.)

MICHIGAN

"Professional Advantage" Provision Not Applicable to Just Cause Transfer

An arbitrator upheld the involuntary transfer of a high-school coach/history teacher to the same assignment at a middle school because that transfer was based on educational reasons and the needs of the district.

Referring to the section in the agreement which provided that seniority in the school system was to be determined by certification and by continuous employment in a particular grade level in K-8 and subject matter in grades 9-12, the Association contended that the transfer deprived the teacher of the professional advantage of continuing to accrue high-school level seniority.

The board asserted that under the agreement it had the right to transfer any employee, and that the language, "deprived of professional advantage," did not refer to transfers and that there was no limitation on the board's right to transfer. The board further maintained that the transfer was for just cause, and was not, therefore, arbitrary or capricious.

Under the seniority system, the teacher would be the first to be laid off in the middle school in the event of a layoff. Additionally, his years of high-school seniority would stay frozen, thus depriving him of the advantage of continuing to build up security on the same basis as if he had remained at the high-school level.

On the basis of the effects of the seniority system, the arbitrator conceded that an argument could be made that the transfer did result in the professional deprivation of the teacher. However, his interpretation of the language "without just cause" led him to believe that it was a modification of the limitation put on the board's right to transfer on the assumption that the transfer deprived a teacher in grievance situations of a "professional advantage."

In the absence of evidence of arbitrary or capricious action, the arbitrator held that the transfer was for just cause and that the "professional advantage" provision of the contract had not been violated. (Blissfield Board of Education v. Blissfield Education Association, American Arbitration Association, November 16, 1974.)

Substitute Report Form Does Not Change Terms and Conditions of Employment

A trial examiner for the Michigan Employment Relations Commission ruled that the use of a "substitute report form," which was alleged to be an instrument for evaluating teachers, did not constitute a unilateral change in terms and conditions of employment since the form was "merely a means of finding out if the teacher is performing the required terms and conditions of employment." Furthermore, the examiner ruled that under the statutory time limit of six months established by the Public Employment Relations Act, no unfair labor practice charge could now be filed because the form had been introduced three years ago. The examiner dismissed the unfair labor practice charge filed by the Romulus Education Association against the Romulus Board of Education.

In spring 1974, the Association discovered that several principals were requiring substitute teachers to fill out a report form on which the substitute was to indicate the presence or absense of a seating chart, an attendance sheet, and lesson plans, ease of following those plans, courtesy from the pupils, and order and cleanliness in the classroom. The Association requested the Assistant Superintendant in charge of personnel to stop using the forms. The superintendent denied that they were being used to evaluate teachers and promised that the use of the form would stop.

When the use of the form did not end by May, the Association filed an unfair labor practice charge with MERC, alleging that the board had engaged in unlawful refusal to bargain by unilaterally promulgating an instrument which could be used in evaluating teachers.

The board argued that the charge should be dismissed because the form was not used to evaluate teachers and was not issued by the board but by various principals, and did not constitute a unilateral change in working conditions. The board contended that even if the use of the form was considered an unfair labor practice, the Association had failed to meet the statutory time limit of six months established under the Public Employment Relations Act for filing a complaint, because the form had been introduced three years before.

A MERC examiner held that no unfair labor practice had occurred because the forms were not being used to evaluate teachers, and even if they were so used, they would not be a change in terms and conditions of employment because they were "merely a means of finding out if the teacher is performing the required terms and conditions of employment." He concluded that even if the use of the forms was considered an unfair labor practice, the Association had failed to file a charge within the statutory time limit. (In the Matter of Romulus Board of Education and Romulus Education Association, MERC, October 18, 1974.)

Residency Requirement Valid as Condition for Hiring But Not for Promotion

The passage of a resolution imposing a residency requirement as a condition for promotion constitutes a unilateral change in terms and conditions of employment and violates the employer's duty to bargain, even though the resolution has not been implemented. Therefore, the Michigan Employment Relations Commission confirmed the decision of an administrative law judge and dismissed objections to his decision raised by the Detroit Board of Education and several unions representing teachers and other city school board employees. Conditions of hiring and recruitment, however, are not subject to mandatory collective bargaining under the Public Employment Relations Act, because the Act does not cover job applicants. Therefore, the Act permits a public employer to impose a residency requirement as a condition for hiring and recruitment.

The City of Detroit school board adopted a resolution requiring residency in the city as a condition for hiring, recruitment, and promotion of all employees. Unions representing several groups of board employees filed charges with MERC contending that the board's action constituted a unilateral change in terms and conditions of employment and violated its duty to bargain under the PERA. An administrative law judge ruled that while the adoption of the resolution violated the Act insofar as it dealt with promotions, the resolution was valid with respect to hiring and recruitment.

Both sides appealed to MERC. The board contended that since the resolution had not been implemented and had not affected the promotion of employees, the passage of the resolution by itself did not constitute a violation of the Act. In addition, the board contended that because the matter had not been submitted to arbitration under grievance procedures included in its contracts with the several unions, MERC could not assume jurisdiction. The unions contended that the board was obligated to bargain with respect to terms and conditions of hiring and recruitment, and, therefore, the resolution violated the Act insofar as it affected those subjects.

MERC ruled that the passage of the resolution constituted an act similar to a unilateral promulgation of a plant rule which both the NLRB and the Supreme Court, ruling in the case of NLRB v. Katz (1962), had held to be an unlawful refusal to negotiate under the National Labor Relations Act. As in the case of a plant rule, the resolution indicated that failure to comply with the announced change in promotion standards could result in an employee being penalized by failing to be promoted.

The Commission noted that under the provisions of the Act prescribing a six-month time limit on the filing of an unfair labor practice, the passage of the resolution per se was a violation of the Act because the results of implementation which would occur six months after the passage of the resolution could not be challenged as unfair labor practices, as those practices would be considered as dating from the day the resolution was passed.

With respect to the jurisdictional issue, MERC held that deferral to arbitration was not appropriate because the issue in this dispute was primarily statutory.

Finally, MERC held that the classification, "employees," referred only to those who had already been hired and did not include job applicants. Therefore, MERC concluded that hiring and recruitment standards were not subject to mandatory collective bargaining, and that the Act permitted public employers to impose residency requirements as a condition for obtaining employment. MINNESOTA

Teacher Has "Expected Right" to Salary Credits for Law Courses

Although a contract which provided for an M.A. + 60 salary lane contained no language specifically referring to law school credits, such credits were within the "general periphery" of the provision and the teacher had an "expected right" to be placed in the M.A. + 60 lane upon completion of a law course.

An arbitrator ruled that Anoka-Hennepin School District No. 11, denied a teacher due process of law when it unilaterally refused the teacher the necessary credit for advanced placement without granting him a hearing. Since the contract contained no specific guidelines or restrictions, the district should have advised the teacher of its position.

According to the arbitrator, a teacher has certain contractual and statutory rights. To take them away after the fact is failure to provide equal protection and due process and renders the district action arbitrary, capricious, and unreasonable. Though a district may not intend to act in an arbitratory manner, the unilateral denial of expected rights without prior exploration or a hearing thereafter violates the teacher's due process rights. (Anoka-Hennepin Education Association and Anoka-Hennepin School District 11, Bureau of Mediation Service, July 8, 1974.)

State University Must Bargain as Unit

Shortly after a district court ordered a state-wide unit to represent college faculty members, the director of the Bureau of Mediation Services decided that differences among campuses, colleges, and departments at the University of Minnesota did not warrant separate bargaining units.

Various groups within the university had favored separate units for such reasons as salary diversity, uniqueness of professional accreditation, and difference in level of students taught, that is, postgraduate as opposed to undergraduate. The state public employee law, however, cancelled these arguments advanced by the university groups. (University of Minnesota Board of Regents, et al. and Minnesota Bureau of Mediation Services, December 6, 1974.)

NEW YORK

New York Public Employment Relations Board Negotiated Intent Must Be Implied in Contract Language

Refusing to read into the language of a contract a dollar estimate offered during negotiations between the City of White Plains and Professional Fire Fighters Association, Local No. 274, the Public Employment Relations Board affirmed a hearing officer's decision that the city had the right to unilaterally reduce the sum budgeted for tuition reimbursement, since the contract left the sum to be budgeted at the city's discretion. Therefore, PERB dismissed an unfair labor practice charge filed by the Association against the city.

During negotiations with the Association, city officials estimated that the city would be able to continue its policy of tuition reimbursements to fire fighters taking higher education courses in fire service. The city had estimated that $1,200 would be set aside. Acting on the assumption that this estimate would hold, the Association signed a contract which provided that the amount of reimbursement would be "within budgetary allocations." Subsequently, the city halved the estimated allocation for tuition reimbursement. The Association filed a petition with PERB, charging that the city's unilateral reduction of its previous allocation was in violation of the state Civil Service Law.

A hearing officer dismissed the Association's charges on the grounds that the language of the contract and the uncontradicted testimony of both parties indicated that the Association had agreed that the city would have the unilateral right to determine the sum to be allocated. The Association filed exceptions to the hearing officer's decision before PERB, alleging that the estimate presented by city officials during negotiations had to be read into the language of the agreement.

PERB sustained the hearing officer's conclusion that no sum had been agreed to and the amount to be provided had been left to the city's discretion. (City of White Plains and Professional Fire Fighters Association, Inc., Local No. 274, International Association of Fire Fighters, PERB, May 13, 1974.)

Exclusive Representation Immune to Challenge Until End of Fiscal Year Preceding Expiration of Contract

According to PERB, under the Civil Service Law when a decertification petition is not filed during the open season, the status of a labor organization which is exclusive bargaining representative for public employees under a contract which is not coterminous with the employer's fiscal year remains immune to challenge only until the end of the employer's fiscal year which directly precedes the expiration date of the contract.

Under a two-year collective bargaining agreement scheduled to expire on June 30, 1974, the Civil Service Employees Association was the exclusive bargaining representative for the employees of the New York State Thruway Authority whose fiscal year ended on December 30. On June 20, 1974, the Service Employees International Union filed a decertification petition, requesting the Director of Public Employee Practices and Representation to order a representation election in which the employees of the Authority could choose either to retain CSEA as their bargaining agent or to install SEIU in its place.

When the Director approved the petition, the Authority and the Association requested PERB to reverse his ruling on the grounds that the petition was not timely filed under PERB rules. According to the Authority and the Association, if a contract was not coterminous with the employer's fiscal year and no petition had been filed in the open season during the eighth month before the end of the fiscal year (May 1973) that directly preceded the expiration of the contract, under PERB rules no further petitions could be filed and no election could be held until after the contract expired on June 30, 1974.

PERB rejected this contention, stating that while the time period during which an incumbent bargaining agent cannot be challenged under the Civil Service Law is extended when a petition is not filed during the open season, the extension of immunity in the case of a contract which is not coterminous with the employer's fiscal year is limited by the Civil Service Law to the end of the employer's fiscal year directly preceding the expiration date of the contract. (In Matter of the New York State Thruway Authority and Service Employees International Union, and the Civil Service Employees Association, Inc., New York State Public Employment Relations Board, August 7, 1974.)

OREGON

Dismissals of Pro-Union Employees Improper

Any attempt by an employer to persuade public employees, including supervisors, not to join a labor organization, or any attempt to interfere with their selection of a bargaining agent is unlawful intimidation according to the Oregon Public Employee Relations Board. In addition, PERB ruled that in the context of demonstrated anti-union hostility, dismissals which affect only those employees who are seeking to join a union are improper because of their discriminatory impact even if they are not motivated by an unlawful intent to prevent employees from exercising their rights. Therefore, PERB, acting on a petiton filed by the Linn-Benton Rural Teachers Association, held that the Price School District had engaged in unlawful coercion of its employees and ordered the district to cease and desist.

The Association, acting on the request of three teachers employed by the district, petitioned PERB to be certified as their bargaining agent. Thereupon, school-board members visited the teacher who served as principal of the system, informing him that they were not happy with the teachers' decision to join the Association, and attempted to persuade him not to join the bargaining unit. Following that visit, the district filed a petition with PERB seeking to exclude the principal from the bargaining unit, and fired the two teachers, one of whom was probationary, on the grounds that they had "neglected slow learners."

The Association filed charges with PERB, contending that both the visit to the principal and the firing of the two teachers constitued unlawful attempts by the district to coerce its employees from exercising their right to bargain under the law. After these charges were filed, the school board stated that the teachers would be allowed to leave the district with a clean record if the charges were dropped.

PERB held that under the collective bargaining statute any attempt by an employer to persuade public employees, including supervisors, not to join a union, or any attempt to interfere with their selection of a bargaining agent was unlawful. Therefore, PERB concluded that the following actions of the school board constituted unlawful coercion: the attempt to persuade the principal not to join, the statements that board members were not happy with the teachers' decision to join, the suggestion that the teachers should negotiate on their own with the board, the offer to provide the teachers with a clean record in return for dropping charges, and the dismissal of the two teachers.

PERB ruled that within the context of the district's anti-union activity and statements, the dismissal of the two teachers was improper because of its discriminatory impact, even if, as the district contended, the dismissals were contemplated and not motivated by hostility to the Association. PERB, however, held that the evidence failed to support the district's contention that its action was not so motivated.

PERB ordered the board to cease and desist from engaging in unlawful coercion of employees; however, it did not order reinstatement of the teachers, but requested the parties to submit briefs on the impact and possible conflict of such an order with respect to the teacher tenure law and the local budget law, since this was the first case where PERB was considering ordering the reinstatement of a probationary teacher. (Linn-Benton Rural Teachers Association v. Price School District, Oregon PERB, November 18, 1974.)

PENNSYLVANIA

Principals and Assistants Not Managerial and Belong in Same Unit

In a case involving the question of the appropriate unit for certain administrative professional employees of McKeesport Area School District, the Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board ruled that the personnel could be properly placed in a unit of first level supervisors because the employees did not perform managerial functions.

The matter arose when the labor organization representing the employees petitioned for approval of a unit comprised of principals, assistant principals, vice-principals, and unit directors. The sole issue was whether some of the employees were first-level supervisors or managerial employees.

A review of the duties of the employees revealed that the disputed personnel exercised only minor supervisory control over classroom teachers and other employees and that their similar assignments were directed by the central administration. Additionally, none of the employees supervised the activities of the others.

For the foregoing reasons, the PERB determined that the employees composition in a single unit was proper. (Matter of the Employees of McKeesport Area School District, Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board, January 13, 1975.)

FEDERAL

NLRB Accepts Jurisdiction over Parochial School System; Excludes Department Chairmen, Vice-Principals, and Nurses from Bargaining Unit

According to the National Labor Relations Board, private schools are not exempt from its jurisdiction as religious institutions unless their instruction is limited to religious subjects. In addition, the Board held that geographically and administratively separate private schools which are operated as an "integrated enterprize" fall within its jurisdiction if their combined assests are equal to $1 million. Therefore, the Board, acting on a representation petition filed by the Baltimore Archdiocesan Lay Teachers Organization, accepted jurisdiction over five high schools operated by the Archdiocese of Baltimore.

The five high schools in question are operated by separate religious orders in different parts of Maryland but owned by the Archdiocese. The Archdiocese approves tuition rates and the selection of principals, provides tuition grants to students, establishes health and benefit plans for all employees, resolves grievances between the faculty and the schools, and has negotiated faculty wage scales and teacher contracts with the faculty group, which it had not formally recognized.

The lay faculty group sought to formalize the relationship and petitioned the NLRB to direct an election among all full-time and regular part-time faculty, including vice-principals, department chairmen, athletic directors, business managers, and nurses.

The Archdiocese claimed that the NLRB lacked jurisdiction since the schools were autonomous and separately failed to meet the $1 million jurisdictional standard which the Board had previously applied to private schools, and were religious institutions since they "provide an education based on Christian principles." In addition, the Archdiocese requested the Board, if it assumed jurisdiction, to exclude vice-principals, department chairmen, business managers, athletic directors, and nurses from the bargaining unit.

The Board ruled that the schools were not exempt from its jurisdiction since the Archdiocese was operating them as an "integrated enterprise" and taken together the schools met the $1 million jurisdictional standard. In addition, the Board held that schools which taught lay subjects could not be exempted as "completely religious" institutions.

However, with respect to the composition of the bargaining unit, the Board ruled in favor of the Archdiocese on all counts. Vice-principals were excluded as supervisors since they exercised the authority of the principal in his absence, had authority to evaluate and reprimand faculty, and assigned substitute teachers. Department chairmen and athletic directors were excluded as supervisors since they had the authority to make effective recommendations with respect to hiring and firing. Business managers, were excluded on the grounds that their primary duties in supervising nonprofessional employees and their quasi- managerial role in preparing budgets coupled with their being paid on a separate salary schedule meant that they lacked sufficient community of interest with the faculty. Finally, nurses were excluded on the grounds that they were not on the faculty salary schedule, did not always receive faculty fringe benefits and their training skills and duties did not relate to those of the faculty.

Therefore, the Board directed an election among all full-time and regular part-time faculty, including librarians, guidance counsellors, and administrators. (Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Baltimore and Baltimore Archdiocesan Lay Teachers Association, January 28, 1975.)

NEGOTIATION NOTES

ARKANSAS

State Agencies Are Not Required To Deduct Union Dues from the Salaries of State Employees

The Arkansas Supreme Court held that, while state agencies were permitted to deduct union dues from the payroll of state employees, such deductions were not mandatory under state law. Therefore, the Court, upholding a lower court ruling, denied the request of Arkansas State Highway Employees, Local 1315, for a writ of mandamus ordering the State Highway Commission to reinstate dues deductions.

In 1955, the Arkansas legislature enacted a statute which provided that "deductions from the payrolls of state employees . . . shall be permitted only for the following purposes." The purposes enumerated included withholding taxes, social security, retirement, and group medical and life insurance. Between 1965 and 1973, the legislature added credit unions, union dues, value of maintenance, and purchase of U.S. Savings Bonds.

In 1972, the Highway Commission, which had previously deducted union dues as authorized by members of the union, ceased deducting the dues on the grounds that it was not required to do so. The union filed a writ of mandamus, requesting a state trial court to order the Commission to deduct the dues. After the state trial court denied the writ on the grounds that the statute had not made dues deductions compulsory, the union appealed to the Arkansas Supreme Court, contending that the lower court had misconstrued the statute.

The Arkansas Supreme Court, in a majority decision, ruled that the wording of the statute made it impossible to state that dues deductions were clearly mandatory.

A dissenting opinion held that in spite of the wording of the statute, some of the deductions "permitted" were in fact mandatory, and deductions for savings bonds, credit unions, union dues, etc. would not have been included by the legislature unless they were likewise mandatory, since state agencies could not be expected to voluntarily pay for the necessary bookkeeping. FLORIDA

PERC Adopts Rules and Regulations

The rules and regulations of the Florida Public Employees Relations Commission (PERC), designed to regulate the state's new public bargaining law, took effect in November 1974.

The rules define 23 terms and describe procedures for certification of employee organizations. This section covers petitions for clarifying bargaining units and amending certifications, and procedures for hearings, motions, introduction of evidence, subpoenas, and records. The rules also outline procedures for conducting representation elections and runoffs. The rules additionally include unfair labor practice procedures which cover the filing and processing of charges, issuing complaints, answers, intervention, hearings, motions, waivers, introduction of evidence, subpoenas, records, and PERC determination. Procedures for resolving impasse include mediation, fact finding and recommendations by a "special master," and referral of unresolved disputes to the employer's legislative body which shall take any action it considers necessary in the interests of both the public and public employees.

MINNESOTA

Attorney General Opinion

The state attorney general, interpreting section 179.63 of the Minnesota law, ruled that the work week was undeniably a term or condition of employment because it involved hours of employment. Thus, public employers are required to bargain over the work week, and if no agreement is reached, the issue may be arbitrated.

This interpretation was based on the decision on Firefighters Union, Local 1186, International Association of Fire Fighters, AFL-CIO v. City of Vallejo, et al., in which the California Supreme Court held that the union's proposal for a work week was arbitrable. Additional support for the attorney general's position was found in Local Union No. 189, Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workers, et al. v. Jewel Tea Company where the Supreme Court of the United States interpreted the scope of bargaining under the National Labor Relations Act and held that hours of the day and days of the week are mandatory subjects of bargaining.

The attorney general also considered the question of whether subcontracting out of work normally performed by bargaining unit members was negotiable and arbitrable. While similar cases under the NLRA held the affirmative, supportive decisions of state labor boards were found which permitted temporary subcontracting of special work not usually performed by the bargaining unit and held that they were not negotiable and arbitrable.

Citing several decisions of the Connecticut Board of Mediation and Conciliation concerning the question of subcontracting, the attorney general stated that the cases offered guidelines for determining whether the subcontracting of work is a mandatory subject of negotiation. He stressed, however, that since the parties in these cases failed to clarify their final positions as to the material nature of the subcontracting, the litigations could not represent precedents. As such, the attorney general refrained from ruling on this matter.

Back Pay for Women Varsity Coaches Ordered

The New York Human Rights Division awarded retroactive pay to five women coaches in Camden who complained that they were not being paid the same salary as men coaches.

In response to the coaches' complaint against the school board, the Human Rights Division also called for nondiscrimination in coaching assignments, for salary schedules reflecting equal work for equal pay, and for the establishment of a review committee to make recommendations to the coaching staff. (Camden, New York, School District and Camden Teachers Association, New York Human Rights Division, 1974.)

Michigan and Pennsylvania Increase Survivors' Death Benefits

Recent legislation in Michigan and Pennsylvania has revised and upgraded death and survivor benefits paid to the estate or heirs of public employees. In Michigan, these payments are now to include all accrued fringe benefits and employer contributions to retirement funds. Pennsylvania, however, permits only a maximum of $2,000 in wages, salary, and accrued vacation benefits to be paid by the employer.

FEDERAL

NLRB Report on Health Care Institutions

In his quarterly report, the National Labor Relations Board General Counsel discussed several issues in labor-management relations in health care institutions.

- In a refusal-to-bargain case, the General Counsel issued a complaint against an employer who asserted, before contract negotiations, that department heads were improperly included in a unit of laboratory technicians because they were supervisors under the Taft-Hartley Act. The unit had been certified previously by the Michigan Employment Relations Commission before the hospital amendments to the Act took effect. Rejecting the employer's contention, the General Counsel commented, "It is settled law that even a good faith, but erroneous doubt as to the appropriateness of a unit does not privilege a refusal to bargain with an incumbent union."
- Other complaints by the General Counsel were directed against two employers who forbade the distribution of union literature. In the first case where distribution was banned on the entire hospital premises, the General Counsel stated that the ban was "presumptively unlawful" because it was not limited to work areas, and that further proceedings were warranted in regard to the implementation of the rule.
- In the second case, the employer forbade the distribution of union literature in the cafeteria and the coffee shop. Here, the General Counsel stated that the legality of the rule must be determined because employers may ban the distribution of literature in employee work areas even during non-working hours, but employees performed no work in the areas in question.
- Another case involved the suspension of three workers who used their coffee break to discuss working conditions. The plant services manager who met with the group told them they were engaging in a work stoppage. The General Counsel concluded that the employer's charge was without cause since there was clearly no evidence of an alleged work stoppage.
- The NLRB General Counsel issued a complaint against a union that struck three hospitals and triggered a work stoppage at a fourth, on the grounds that the union failed to notify the affected employer of its intention to picket. The General Counsel cited section 8(g) of the National Labor Relations Act which, as he said in another case, showed that Congress intended a health care institution to receive advance notice of any contemplated work stoppage activities in order to assure the well-being of patients.

Joinder of Non-charged Union Does Not Require Dismissal for Lack of Jurisdiction

In a suit brought against the Braswell Motor Freight Lines by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission for alleged racial discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, the U.S. District Court ruled that join-der of a non-charged union does not compel dismissal for lack of technical requirements.

The unions argued that failure to charge them before the EEOC and failure to follow the prerequisites of the Civil Rights Act required dismissal. They further contended that joinder could not prevent dismissal for lack of jurisdiction.

The EEOC asserted that joinder of the unions need not be based on fulfillment of the jurisdictional steps, and, therefore, the unions were properly joined as defendants.

Countering, the defendants cited a similar case (Miller) which upheld their position. However, the court pointed out that the rule in Miller which maintained that failure to name defendants in EEOC charge, required dismissal, was not absolute, as substantiated in Held v. Missouri where joinder of a union was upheld, without technical requirements, on the grounds that it was indispensible to the proper administration of relief, compelled by the evidence.

Concluding that since the unions were not charged with violations of the Civil Rights Act and the prerequisites of the Act were not fulfilled, the court overruled the motions to dismiss and limit relief. (Equal Employment Opportunity Commission v. Braswell Motor Freight Lines, Inc., U.S. District Court, August 28, 1974.)

First Amendment Does Not Provide Employees with Right to a Grievance Procedure or Right To Bargain Collectively

Employers are not required by the First Amendment to the federal Constitution to grant collective bargaining rights or a grievance procedure to employees. Further and employer may legitimately withhold these rights from policemen while granting them to other municipal employees owing to the nature of police work. In addition, where a school board is an "independent corporate entity," the city or other jurisdiction connected with that school board is not the employer of school employees and, therefore, is not accountable for differences in rights between school-board employees and other municipal workers.

The Chicago Police Department provided no grievance procedure for its employees, except in cases of discharges or suspensions exceeding 30 days. After unsuccessful efforts to get the Department to establish a grievance procedure covering hours, wages, assignments, and other working conditions, the Confederation filed suit in the U.S. District Court charging the city with violation of employee rights under the First Amendment by failing to establish a uniform grievance procedure and some form of collective bargaining for patrolmen. In addition, the Confederation contended that the city had violated the 14th Amendment by discriminating against police, since the "non academic" employees of the Chicago Board of Education had been granted collective bargaining rights and municipal library workers had been granted a grievance procedure.

The court held that the First Amendment does not provide employees with rights to a grievance procedure or mandatory collective bargaining, and that, therefore, the granting of these rights remains within the discretion of the city or the state legislature. In exercising its discretion, the court held, the city would have a legitimate purpose in granting collective bargaining and a grievance procedure to others while denying them to police since the nature of police work requires that the Department have unquestioned authority in making assignments in emergencies and that police instantly obey orders. However, the court noted that since the board of education and the library board were distinct corporate entities, the city was not the employer of the municipal workers in question and, therefore, not accountable for differences between the rights accorded to those workers and those accorded police. The court dismissed the complaint. (Confederation of Police v. City of Chicago, USDC No. Ill., October 7, 1974.)

Congress Removes Hatch Act Restrictions on State and Municipal Employees

State and municipal employees working in agencies which receive federal funds are now permitted to work voluntarily, on their own time, for candidates of their choice or to run for elective office as nonpartisan or independent candidates. This change in federal law, Title IV of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1974 amending the Hatch Act, affects immediately state and municipal employees in 40 states where state laws do not contain the Hatch Act prohibitions which were repealed by the new statute.

The amended statute retains those provisions of the Hatch Act which prohibit managers or supervisors from forcing employees to contribute to or work for a candidate, and prohibit state and municipal employees whom it covers from using their official positions to influence the outcome of an election. State and municipal employees covered by the new statute are barred from running as candidates affiliated with any party whose candidates for Presidential elector received votes in the last Presidential election.

The U.S. Office of Revenue Sharing maintains that the remaining Hatch Act restrictions are inapplicable to state and local employees whose salaries are partly or entirely provided out of revenue-sharing funds. Its position has received support from ranking members of the Senate Finance Committee and the House Ways and Means Committee who have stated that the Congress did not intend revenue-sharing funds to be subject to the Hatch Act. The Civil Service Commission opposes this position, and the matter is to be resolved by the Justice Department.

SPECIAL REPORTS

FACULTY BARGAINING UNITS IN HIGHER EDUCATION

Lawrence M. Robinson

Faculty bargaining units in public and private junior colleges, four-year colleges, and universities include regularly employed full-time teachers. This survey of 145 higher education contracts attempts to determine the extent to which employees other than full-time teachers are included in faculty bargaining units. In addition to the contract survey, an analysis is made of existing units in higher education as determined by the National Labor Relations Board and state boards.

Findings of Contract Analysis

For purposes of this study, employees other than full-time teaching staff were classified as follows:

Librarians: professional librarians who have an MLS degree; may not include the head librarian who is often regarded as supervisory
Counselors: guidance counselors, not necessarily including academic counselors or admissions counselors
Specialists: research related personnel such as research faculty, technologists, technicians, laboratory assistants, and media and audiovisual specialists
Nurses: individuals with these titles, not including directors of nursing who are classified as directors
Other professionals: professional employees generally without further specification; includes coaches
Department chairmen: individuals with these titles
Directors: individuals with these titles
Coordinators: individuals with these titles
Administrators: associate deans, assistant deans, registrars, business managers, and others not mentioned frequently enough to merit separate tabulation
Teaching assistants: individuals with these titles in junior colleges; includes graduate assistants and interns in four-year colleges, not including medical interns Non-academic personnel: office, clerical, custodial, and other employees.

Table 1 shows the number of contracts and the percent of all contracts which mention these groups, and the number and percent of contracts which include these groups in faculty bargaining units. Part-time faculty were excluded from contracts which included full-time faculty only. In some contracts, however, faculty teaching one-half of a normal work load were included in the faculty unit as "part-time faculty," while other part-time faculty, teaching less than one-half of a normal load were excluded. When these so-called full-time faculty units actually include part-time faculty the latter are listed in the table as included in these units.

Unit determination and the categories of employees included or excluded from the unit depend upon several factors. Most units are determined on the basis of community of interest, the focus of each employee group, and the employee position in relation to the over-all mission of the employer. Other factors which may work to expand or contract the scope of the unit are supervisory or reporting lines, faculty governance structure, working conditions, geographic location of the campus with respect to the central campus, special curriculum, budgetary control, and past practice.

The inclusion or exclusion of certain types of employees, notably department chairmen, program coordinators, counselors, administrative faculty or professionals, and librarians depends on the scope of the particular job and the relationship of that position to other teaching or administrative faculty positions. As a rule if a position has attached to it such supervisory duties as recommends hiring, firing, promotions, or direction of personnel, or is involved in the labor relations process, it is excluded from the unit. For personnel, such as program coordinators and department chairmen, the amount of time required for directing the work force versus the amount of classroom teaching time will be a criterion for determining whether that position is supervisory or within the employee unit. Part-time faculty are usually included in the over-all faculty unit if their relation to the full-time faculty and involvement in the governance structure is deemed sufficient, and if they are required to teach more than one-half of the normal teaching load of the regular faculty. Research assistants, graduate assistants, interns, and fellows may be included or excluded, depending upon their relationship with the institution and the focus of their relationship. If the accent is on teaching or research, they may be included. If the accent is on learning, however, rather than teaching or research, they may be excluded. The source and reason for funding the particular position may also be very important.

This is by no means an exhaustive list of criteria which may be utilized to test the appropriateness of an employee group or employee position within the over-all faculty unit. Appropriate units are determined on a case-by-case basis, the above-mentioned criteria being tests of appropriateness.

Part-time faculty are typically included in private four-year college bargaining units but excluded from faculty bargaining units in the public sector. The majority of contracts which include part-time faculty at either 4- or 2-year colleges require one-half or more of a normal load as a minimum for inclusion.

Librarians and counselors are included in faculty bargaining units irrespective of the type of institution.

Specialists are included in faculty bargaining units at public institutions but excluded from those units at private 4-year colleges. Research-related positions are the most frequently mentioned in contracts of personnel at all institutions. Media specialists are mentioned only in public institutions, and with one exception all of those are junior colleges.

Nurses are mentioned only in a few public junior colleges where half the contracts include them and half exclude them.

Other professionals are included in eight contractually defined faculty bargaining units. Four of these include professional employees generally. Out of these four, two are public 4-year colleges, one is a public junior college, and one is a private 4-year college. Coaches are included at one public junior college, and one public 4-year college, but are excluded from another public 4-year college and one private 4-year college. The remaining inclusions in this category involve non-student aides, reading specialists, and professional assistants who are separately included in junior college bargaining units.

Department chairmen are included only in public 4-year college bargaining units. Coordinators are included only in public junior college bargaining units.

All other groups are typically excluded from faculty bargaining units, regardless of the type of institution. While it appears that teaching assistants are included in bargaining units at 4-year public colleges, there is no indication that teaching assistants differ from graduate assistants who are generally excluded from 4-year public college bargaining units.

Outside New York and Washington, directors appear to be the highest level of administrator included in faculty bargaining units. In New York, deans are included in the bargaining unit at Monroe Junior College, while associate and assistant deans are included in the bargaining unit at SUNY. In Washington, only two junior college contracts out of 11 exclude administrators other than the president of the college. The president or other chief executive officer is the only administrator excluded from faculty bargaining units by the state's junior college bargaining law.

Only one contract from Maine and one from Michigan make the inclusion of administrators dependent upon a specified teaching load. Both contracts are from junior colleges.

Bargaining units at public 4-year colleges are the broadest in scope since they include department chairmen who are typically excluded from faculty bargaining units at other institutions, and specialists who are excluded from private-four year colleges.

National Labor Relations Board Determinations

At present the NLRB has jurisdiction only over private educational institutions with assets of $1 million or more. The Board may intervene in the process of establishing a bargaining unit in several ways. This study, however, considers only those NLRB decisions where the Board has ruled either to include or exclude the groups defined in Part I from faculty bargaining units.

Since 1971, the Board has made at least 19 decisions pertaining to appropriate faculty bargaining units; they have involved only private 4-year colleges. The most recent survey conducted by the National Center for the Study of Collective Bargaining in Higher Education found 38 faculty bargaining units at private 4-year colleges. It appears that the NLRB has made a unit determination in approximately half of the existing faculty bargaining units. At the remaining private 4-year colleges, the parties have been able to agree upon the composition of the bargaining unit, and have, therefore, not called upon the Board to make a unit determination.

When the Board is requested to make a unit determination, it has broad discretionary power under the National Labor Relations Act to consider the unit as a whole, including groups whom the parties themselves have agreed to include or exclude. In these 19 decisions, however, it appears that the Board confined itself to making rulings on groups or individuals whose inclusion was disputed.

The following table indicates the number of decisions the Board made regarding particular groups and the outcomes of those decisions. The decisions are tabulated in rank order of inclusion.

Group	Number of decisions	Included	Excluded
Librarians	8	8	0
Guidance counselors	1	1	0
Directors	6	4	2
Department chairmen	8	5	3
Other administrators	10	5	5
Other professionals	9	3	6
Graduate assistants	2	0	2
Part-time faculty (since July 1973)	4	0	4
Part-time faculty (before 1973)	8	8	0

In these 19 decisions the Board developed guidelines for applying the National Labor Relations Act to higher education faculty bargaining units. Under the NLRA, professionals and nonprofessionals may not be included in the same bargaining unit unless each group separately votes for a mixed unit. In its first unit determination case, at Long Island University in 1971, the Board started from the premise that faculty bargaining units were professional since the core of such units consisted of teachers. At LIU the Board was asked to decide if librarians, guidance counselors, the director of guidance, admissions counselors, research scientists, and laboratory assistants should be included in the faculty bargaining unit. The Board resolved this question by including those employees who were engaged in "professional work" and excluding others. According to the Board, professional work is work which requires employees to utilize advanced training in a specialized field and to exercise independent discretion and judgment.

At LIU, the Board concluded that librarians, guidance counselors, and research scientists were engaged in professional work and, therefore, included them in faculty bargaining units. In subsequent cases, the Board consistently included these groups in faculty bargaining units unless they were supervisory employees.

The Board also concluded at LIU and in subsequent cases that others, including academic or admissions counselors, laboratory technicians who work under close supervision, coaches, and full-time administrators were not engaged in professional work, and consistently excluded them unless they shared a community of interest with faculty which specifically includes line of reporting or supervision.

In addition, the Board has also applied this occupational distinction to part-time administrators who were not held to be supervisors or managerial and confidential employees. Those who also functioned as teachers, librarians, guidance counselors, or research scientists have been included in faculty bargaining units, while all others have been excluded, irrespective of title or faculty rank.

Department Chairmen—Under the National Labor Relations Act, supervisors have no right to bargain since the Act specifically excludes them from coverage. The Act defines supervisors as individuals who exercise authority to hire, fire, promote, transfer, assign, reward, or discipline other employees or to effectively recommend the same, provided that the exercise of authority requires the use of independent judgment and is not merely routine or clerical.

While the question of supervisory authority has also risen with regard to directors, other administrators, and certain professionals, department chairmen have been the focal point of this issue in three rulings where the Board indicated what it considered to be a "supervisor" in the area of higher education. These rulings occurred in the cases at Long Island University (1971), Fordham University (1971), and New York University (1973).

In all three cases, the central issue was the power of department chairmen to make recommendations concerning hiring, firing, and promotion. At LIU, the department chairmen alone submitted recommendations, and the Board held that they were supervisors since their recommendations were "effective." Some months later at Fordham, however, the Board dealt with department chairmen whose recommendations regarding hiring, etc. were submitted along with those of other faculty in their departments. Here the Board concluded that the department chairmen were not supervisors, even though their recommendations were more effective than those of other faculty, on the grounds that the greater effectiveness of their recommendations was a result of their greater experience and expertise as individuals, rather than of their position. At NYU, the Board held that department chairmen did not have supervisory authority even though their recommendations were the only ones submitted and were effective, because they submitted their recommendations only after consulting with and obtaining the consent of other faculty.

The remaining issue involved in these cases was the department chairman's role in directly supervising and assigning work to other employees. Considering the Board's rulings on both recommendations and direct supervision, it appears that in higher education, the Board defines supervisors as individuals who do one of the following: (a) directly supervise or assign work to members of the bargaining unit; (b) spend 50 percent of their time supervising the work of employees who are not included in the bargaining unit; (c) act alone in submitting recommendations with respect to hiring, tenure, or dismissal of bargaining unit employees without the advice and consent of other faculty members, provided those recommendations are "effective."

Deans, Assistant Deans, and Managerial and Confidential Employees—In its official guide to the National Labor Relations Act, the Board states that as a matter of policy, it excludes from bargaining units "employees in executive positions and employees who act in a confidential capacity to an employer's labor relations officials," even though they are not expressly excluded by the language of the Act itself. The Board holds that administrators who have independent decision-making authority with respect to the selection of department chairmen or the allocation of budgets must be designated as managerial and confidential employees. The Board applied this definition to exclude from the bargaining units deans at the University of Miami (1974) who were responsible for the distribution of budgets and faculty salaries, and who had the authority to reject the nominees of the faculty for positions of department chairmen. Under this same definition, however, the Board included associate and assistant deans in faculty bargaining units at Miami and Catholic University Law School (1973) since they were not permitted to use independent judgment when they acted as substitutes for the deans.

Part-Time Faculty, Graduate Assistants, and Nonteaching Professionals—The NLRA, apart from excluding supervisors from coverage, and placing conditions on the inclusion of nonprofessionals in bargaining units with professional employees, does not provide further guidelines in determining who may be included in a faculty bargaining unit in higher education. In the absence of any history of collective bargaining in higher education, the Board has followed its traditional policy of including only those employees who have a "community of interest," which the Board interprets as the same or substantially similar interests concerning wages, hours, and working conditions. In making unit determinations for 19 faculty bargaining units, the Board has defined "community of interest" in higher education as including a common salary schedule, line of supervision or "reporting," job security, eligibility for promotion and tenure, and regular and permanent status as employees.

The Board has held that its definition of community of interest requires the exclusion of both graduate assistants and part-time faculty from faculty bargaining units. In 1971 at Adelphi University and in 1973 at the College of Pharmaceutical Science at Columbia, the Board held that graduate assistants who were engaged in teaching and research had to be excluded from faculty bargaining units since their connection with their jobs depended on their status as students, and this, in turn, had resulted in differences in terms and conditions of employment between them and other employees.

Before July 1973, the Board held that it would include in faculty bargaining units regular part-time faculty, that is, those who worked at least one quarter of the normal full load, since their chief functions and qualifications were similar. In July 1973 however, in New York University, the Board reversed its position and held that part-time faculty had to be excluded since they did not share similar salaries or benefits, did not participate in university governance, and were not eligible for tenure. The New York University ruling has governed all subsequent Board rulings on part-time faculty.

While the Board has applied the community of interest guideline mainly to part-time faculty and graduate assistants, this guideline has also been applied to nonteaching professionals and administrators where the professional character of their work was questionable. In 1974, in two separate cases at Park Point College and the University of Maimi, the Board apparently concluded that coaching was not clearly professional work, and excluded coaches from faculty bargaining units on the grounds that their line of reporting was not similar to that of the faculty, and they lacked various other considerations of community of interest such as eligibility for tenure and a connected salary schedule. In addition, the case at the University of Miami also involved research associates, whose status as professionals was considered questionable since they lacked independence of judgment and discretion in their work. The Board permitted them to vote, however, subject to challenge, since they taught classes and their line of reporting was the same as that of faculty.

At Florida Southern College and Tusculum College in 1972, the Board dealt with deans of students and other administrators who were not guidance counselors but acted as student advisors, held advanced degrees and faculty rank, and participated on faculty committees. The Board ruled that in spite of their degrees, they were not professionals, since their work did not require them to utilize advanced academic training. The Board then concluded, in each case, that in spite of their faculty rank, the administrators lacked community of interest with the faculty since their line of reporting was not the same.

State Boards Determinations

The following is an examination of unit determination by state boards in Hawaii, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, and Wisconsin. While other state boards have made unit determinations for faculty bargaining units, particularly in Pennsylvania, their decisions are not available except in scattered instances.

While all of the boards in these states have jurisdiction over public colleges and junior colleges, only those in Michigan, New Jersey, and Rhode Island exercise jurisdiction in the private sector outside NLRB jurisdiction. There is no evidence, however, that any board in these states has made a unit determination involving private 4-year colleges.

The direct impact of state board decisions on the composition of faculty bargaining units has been far greater at public 4-year colleges than at public junior colleges. A comparison of available contracts from these states with the published records of these state boards indicates that while these boards have made unit determinations in 13 out of 80 existing faculty bargaining units at public junior colleges, these same boards have made unit determinations in 8 out of 15 existing faculty bargaining units at public 4-year colleges. Therefore, while the composition of faculty bargaining units at most public junior colleges in these states has been established through voluntary agreement, state boards have made unit determinations at most public 4-year colleges.

The impact of state boards on public 4-year colleges appears to result from the tendency of these colleges to bargain on a system-wide basis. The data from the National Center for the Study of Collective Bargaining in Higher Education indicate that public 4-year colleges are bargaining on a system-wide basis in 7 out of 9 states for which contracts are available, and that system-wide contracts account for more than 25 percent of all contracts from public 4-year colleges. In comparison, the same data indicate that public junior colleges are bargaining on a system-wide basis in 6 out of 16 states, and that system-wide contracts account for less than 1 percent of all contracts from public junior colleges.

It is clear that when a state board determines the composition of a system-wide unit, the direct impact of its decision is greater than if it had ruled only on a few institutions within a system. It is also possible, however, that the creation of system-wide units at public 4-year colleges has increased the likelihood of board intervention by making it more difficult for the parties to arrive at a voluntary agreement on the scope of the bargaining unit.

Table 2 shows the ratio of inclusion to exclusion in state board decisions for defined groups. For example, Michigan's board made five decisions on part-time faculty and included them in four cases.

The following table shows the number of boards that include and the number that exclude groups of personnel. A board is considered as including a group unless the majority of its decisions excluded that group.

Community of Interest, Part-Time Faculty, and Graduate Assistants—The NLRB's practice of defining community of interest in higher education in relation to terms and conditions of employment has been followed by state boards in New York, New Jersey, Hawaii, and Wisconsin. These state boards, like the NLRB, have applied the community of interest test to exclude graduate assistants, and to exclude or restrict the inclusion of part-time faculty. New York's PERB, excluded all part-time faculty from the faculty bargaining unit at the City University of New York on grounds of differences in fringe benefits, tenure, and methods of determining salary. New Jersey's PERC, in 1969, excluded all part-time faculty from the faculty bargaining unit at the state colleges on the grounds that teaching employment was not their principal source of income since they had only a temporary interest in the colleges. Wisconsin, in 1963, excluded part-time faculty who worked less then half time from the faculty bargaining unit of the Milwaukee Board of Vocational and Technical Education on the grounds that the employer had provided different conditions of employment, wages, and benefits. Hawaii's HERB excluded graduate assistants from the faculty bargaining unit at the University of Hawaii on the grounds that their salary schedule and the nature of their appointments and work differed from that of the rest of the faculty.

In Michigan, however, MERC has defined community of interest in a manner that excludes consideration of terms and conditions of employment. MERC stated its position most explicitly in the case of Wayne State University (1972) wherein it included nonteaching professionals described as "academic staff" in a faculty bargaining unit. After noting that "the teaching faculty have historically been treated differently from other University personnel with regard to wages, hours, and working conditions," the Commission concluded that "notwithstanding the noted differences between the two groups, they share a single community of interest", since they are "functionally integrated by virtue of their synergistic efforts aimed at the education of university students."

Acting on the basis that in higher education all those whose efforts are directed at the education of students have a community of interest, MERC has consistently included regular part-time faculty and excluded only those who were hired on a semester basis on the grounds that their inclusion would create instability in the bargaining unit. In addition, MERC in the case of the University of Michigan (1972) stated that graduate assistants or other student employees would be included in faculty bargaining units if they performed bargaining unit work; however, MERC has not yet dealt with a request to include them.

Nonteaching Professionals—Whereas the NLRB's treatment of part-time faculty and graduate assistants has generally been followed by state boards, no state board has followed NLRB practice in dealing with nonteaching professionals. The NLRB has tended to exclude such nonteaching professionals as academic or admissions counselors, laboratory technicians, and coaches on the grounds that they were not engaged in professional work. State boards did not apply this concept and, therefore, did not exclude any of them on the basis of their duties unless those duties made them subject to exclusion as supervisors or managerial and confidential employees.

In general, state boards in Michigan, New York, and New Jersey have included nonteaching professionals in faculty bargaining units where they passed the community of interest test. New York's PERB included all nonteaching professionals and administrators who were not managerial employees in faculty bargaining units at the City University of New York (1968), the State University of New York, Jefferson Community College, and Adirondack Community College since the employers had not provided different terms and conditions of employment for nonteaching professionals and administrators as opposed to faculty. New Jersey's PERC included all nonteaching professionals and administrators in the faculty bargaining unit at the state colleges but excluded some administrative employees from the bargaining unit at Middlesex Community College. In Michigan, MERC has consistently included nonteaching professionals and all administrators who were not supervisors or managerial employees in faculty bargaining units.

Department Chairmen—In dealing with cases where parties have argued that department chairmen or administrators should be excluded as supervisors, several state boards have not operated like the NLRB. The NLRB operates under the National Labor Relations Act which excludes supervisors from its coverage. State statutes in Hawaii, New York, and Rhode Island, however, do not exclude supervisors from all bargaining units of rank and file employees. The Hawaii Board ruled that since the legislature had avoided segregating supervisory and nonsupervisory employees in the bargaining unit of the University of Hawaii, department chairmen could be included in that unit although they had supervisory authority. The New York PERB included department chairmen in the faculty bargaining unit at the State University of New York in 1971 on the grounds that the Taylor Law did not exclude supervisors from rank and file bargaining units of public employees, and in fact there was no necessary conflict between supervisors and professionals since the actual degree of supervision of professionals was minimal. In Rhode Island, the board included department chairmen in the faculty unit at the University of Rhode Island on the grounds that they did not exercise "management control duties" and their functions were "not dissimilar" from those of other teachers.

Within the context of the National Labor Relations Act, the NLRB has held that department chairmen are supervisors if they possess the power to effectively recommend the hiring, firing, or promotion of employees. State boards in Michigan and New Jersey operate under statutes which prohibit the inclusion of supervisors in bargaining units of rank and file employees, and apply the doctrine of effective recommendation to define who is a supervisor.

Whereas the NLRB has included department chairmen in the majority of cases, state boards in Michigan and New Jersey have typically excluded them. The NLRB, in applying the concept of effective recommendation in a wide range of circumstances, concluded that although the recommendations of a department chairman or administrator may be effective, the individual involved is not, therefore, a supervisor unless his or her recommendations are the only ones submitted, or are submitted without the advice and consent of other department faculty. In New Jersey, PERC has never dealt with a case where the chairmen have acted only with the advice and consent of other faculty, or where other faculty have submitted recommendations. Therefore, in applying the concept of effective recommendation, PERC has consistently excluded department chairmen from faculty bargaining units on the grounds that their recommendations were followed in the majority of cases and were, therefore, effective.

In Michigan, however, MERC has departed from the NLRB in refusing to distinguish between chairmen who act alone and chairmen whose recommendations are submitted along with those of other faculty. MERC has held that department chairmen have to be excluded from rank and file bargaining units if their recommendations are usually followed. Therefore, MERC excluded department chairmen from the bargaining unit at Eastern Michigan University (1972), even though other faculty also submitted recommendations on the grounds that the chairmen's recommendations were more likely to be followed where there was a conflict.

As was previously stated, the National Labor Relations Board included department chairmen at Fordham under similar circumstances on the grounds that the greater effectiveness of their recommendations was a result of "experience and expertise" rather than supervisory authority. On the other hand, MERC included department chairmen in the faculty bargaining unit at Southwestern Michigan College (1969), even though their recommendations were the only ones submitted, on the grounds that they were not usually followed. The NLRB, is contrast, has never included department chairmen in a faculty bargaining unit where their recommendations were the only ones submitted.

Managerial and Confidential Employees—State boards in Hawaii and New York have dealt with cases involving deans and assistant deans which raised the issue of managerial and confidential employees. In both states, relevant statutes follow the policy of the NLRB in mandating the exclusion of managerial and confidential employees from bargaining units. In line with NLRB rulings, Hawaii's HERB held that deans had to be excluded from the faculty bargaining unit at the University of Hawaii as managerial employees since they made policy decisions on matters involving curriculum, personnel, budget allocation, and student services.

Whereas the NLRB has held that associate and assistant deans must be excluded only insofar as they are permitted to use independent judgment when they act as substitutes for deans, the state boards have taken different approaches. HERB excludes associate and assistant deans as confidential employees since otherwise they could not be allowed to function as advisers to the deans for purposes of collective bargaining. In New York, however, PERB included associate and assistant deans in the faculty bargaining unit at the State University of New York in 1971 on the grounds that all parties had not agreed to their exclusion and it was impossible to issue guidelines on who was or was not managerial where the faculty themselves participated in governance.

Some groups are generally included or excluded from full-time faculty bargaining units, irrespective of institutional characteristics or how the bargaining unit was established. While librarians and guidance counselors are typically included in faculty bargaining units, directors, graduate assistants, teaching assistants, and nonacademic employees are generally excluded.

When contracts alone are considered, the inclusion or exclusion of other groups varies with the type of institution. Unlike either private or public 4-year colleges, junior colleges tend to include coordinators in faculty bargaining units. Private 4-year colleges tend to exclude other professionals and specialists who are usually included in the public sector. In addition, unlike institutions in the public sector, private colleges tend to include part-time faculty.

Within both the private and the public sectors, however, the extent to which some groups are included or excluded depends on whether the unit is arrived at by voluntary agreement or is the outcome of a board order. NLRB decisions have usually resulted in the inclusion of department chairmen and other administrators, and since 1973, the exclusion of part-time faculty. State board decisions have usually resulted in the inclusion of directors and other administrators who are excluded by the majority of contracts from faculty bargaining units in both junior and 4-year public colleges. In addition, state boards have often included part-time faculty and department chairmen who are excluded from faculty bargaining units at public junior colleges.

Faculty bargaining units in the public sector tend to be somewhat broader than those in the private sector. This is particularly true of the public 4-year colleges where most bargaining units have been established by state boards, a seeming result of multi-unit or system-wide bargaining in public 4-year colleges. With the single exception of Nebraska, state college systems which are covered by a system-wide contract establish one faculty bargaining unit covering all campuses. Of all system-wide bargaining units established only New Jersey excludes part-time faculty; however, none excludes department chairmen. In addition, four of five state-wide systems include specialists or other professionals, and other administrators. The 4-year public colleges in state-wide bargaining units, all of which have been determined by state boards, are generally the broadest in scope. On the other hand, those established by the NLRB under its present rulings tend to be the narrowest in scope insofar as the number of employees working as part-time faculty or other professionals is typically larger than the number working as department chairmen or other administrators.

Teachers' Rights Under Individual Contracts Not Nullified by Later Union Agreement

According to the Superior Court, Sussex County, the vested rights of teachers to payments for past performance under individual or oral contracts cannot be bargained away by union representatives via a negotiated master agreement unless they conflict with the terms of a collective bargaining agreement or "frustrate the policy of the National Labor Relations Act." Therefore, the Court ordered the Woodbridge School District to continue paying moving expenses to six teachers under individual oral contracts which the court viewed as existing separate and apart from the master agreement.

When six teachers negotiated individual contracts with the school board in 1969 and 1970, the school board promised to compensate them for their moving expenses in installments for each of three years of service rendered. However, the board refused to continue making payments under these contracts after it negotiated a master agreement with the union representing the teachers. The teachers filed suit in Sussex County Superior Court, requesting the court to order the board to continue the payments.

The board argued that the payments were intended as general supplements to the state's salary schedule, rather than as reimbursement for moving expenses. Therefore, its obligations to the teachers under their individual contracts were terminated and superceded by the salary schedule in the collective bargaining agreement. The board claimed that in the course of negotiations the union representatives had orally bargained away the teachers rights under their individual contracts.

The Court held that the payments under the board's oral contracts were specifically for moving expenses. However, even if they were considered as general supplements, the Board's obligations to the teachers remained valid under the terms of the collective bargaining agreement because the salary schedule covered only payments for future services, and did not supercede the board's obligations to pay for services already performed under individual contracts. The court noted that the teachers' rights under their individual contracts were protected by the maintenance-of-standards clause in the collective bargaining agreement which prohibited the board from eliminating or reducing existing terms and conditions of employment. Irrespective of the maintenance-of-standards clause, the court ruled that prior individual contracts "are not automatically nullified upon execution of a collective bargaining agreement" and "may be continued in force to the extent that they in no way frustrate the policy of the National Labor Relations Act and do not conflict with the collective bargaining agreement itself." Finally, the court ruled that there was no evidence that the union had made an express agreement with the school board to bargain away the teachers' rights, and that if such an agreement existed, it would be void since union negotiators have no authority to bargain away accrued rights from past performance under individual contracts. (Kolkum et al. v. Board of Education, Woodbridge School District, Superior Court, Sussex County, Delaware.)

FLORIDA

Grievance Procedure Must Be Completed

Overturning a lower court decision, the Florida District Court of Appeal ruled that a teacher and his union, the Monroe Education Association, were entitled to summary judgment in their suit against the school board to compel it to arbitrate the nonrenewal of the teacher's contract.

The Association contended that the lower court erred in refusing it a partial summary judgment on the grounds that the teacher was not entitled to arbitration as part of the grievance procedure and that the Association did not have standing to represent him. The school board contended that the teacher's nontenure status disqualified his entitlement to arbitration, that the teacher failed to comply with time limits, and the Association lacked standing owing to an absence of evidence that the teacher actually held membership in the Association.

On the question of whether it was an error to deny the teacher a partial summary judgment as to his entitlement to the entire grievance procedure, the district court stated that the board's arguments were without merit since from the adoption of the grievance procedure and from the fact that the teacher was granted the procedural steps, it followed that he was entitled to the fifth step, arbitration. The district court asserted that the school board was bound to comply with its own rules and policies for which Vitarelli v. Seaton established the precedent. The court further stated that having invoked the grievance procedure, both parties were obliged to exhaust it as in Merkle v. Rice Construction Company.

As regards the question whether the Association had standing, the district court stated that it was undisputed that the Association might assist by providing legal representation. The court further pointed out that Cannery, Citrus, Drivers, Warehousemen and Allied Employees of Local 444 v. Winter Haven Hospital, Inc. established authority for the proposition that labor organizations do have standing to seek the enforcement of rights conferred upon employees by reason of their employment relationship.

Finding that the Association did have standing to bring suit on behalf of the teacher, the district court declared that the lower court erred in dismissing the second count. Therefore, it reversed the lower court decision and remanded the case to the trial court with directions to reinstate Count II of the complaint, and to grant partial summary judgment concerning the issue of entitlement to arbitration. (Phillip Fredericks et al v. The School Board of Monroe County, Florida District Court of Appeal, February 4, 1975.)

NEW JERSEY

Retirement Bonuses Based on Unused Sick Leave Not Gifts

According to the New Jersey Superior Court, retirement bonuses based upon unused sick leave constitute legitimate compensation paid public employees, and may not be construed as gifts so long as they are included as a condition of employment by statute or contract. Therefore, the court, ruling on behalf of the Maywood Education Association, ordered the Maywood Board of Education to pay retirement bonuses to two teachers under the plan which the board had adopted.

After the state legislature enacted a law providing retirement bonuses for state employees without including teachers, the board of education adopted a plan under which teachers who retired after 20 years would receive their current daily salary for 5 percent of their unused sick leave days as of the September preceding their retirement. However, when two teachers applied to receive this bonus, the board refused to pay it on the grounds that the plan was illegal. The board contended that the failure of the state statute to mention teachers meant that the legislature had not empowered school boards to pay retirement bonuses to teachers and, therefore, these bonuses constituted a "gift" of public money in violation of state law. Association filed suit in New Jersey Superior Court, requesting the court to order the board to pay the two teachers the bonuses due them under the plan.

The court held that since the statute did not prohibit local school boards from adopting retirement bonus plans for teachers, the legislature was permitting school boards to adopt such plans at their discretion. The court concluded that retirement bonuses based on unused sick leave days constituted "a form of compensation withheld or deferred until the completion of continued and faithful service" and that "compensation paid to public employees, whatever the label, is not a gift so long as it is included within the condition of employment either by statutory direction or contract negotiation." (Maywood Education Association et. al. v. Maywood Board of Education, New Jersey Superior Court, December 19, 1974.)

NEW YORK

Filing Charges with PERB Does Not Bar Seeking Arbitration

According to the New York State Supreme Court, Appellate Division, a party to a contract who files charges with PERB is not thereby barred from pursuing the same issue at arbitration. Where a contract contains a broadly worded arbitration clause, the Court held, a dispute on any subject under the contract is presumed to be arbitrable unless the contract contains express language to the contrary. Therefore, the court upheld a lower court's refusal to grant the stay of arbitration requested by the Susquehanna Valley Central School District at Conklin in its dispute with the Susquehanna Teachers Association.

Under a memorandum of understanding between the district and the Association, an investigation of teacher salary structure for 1973-74 was to be discussed by a joint committee which was to issue its report and recommendations by March 15, 1973. However, the committee was never created, and the Association filed unfair labor practice charges which were heard before a PERB hearing officer. Three days after the hearing, the Association demanded that the matter be submitted to arbitration under the contract which stipulated that "a grievance is a claim by any teacher or group of teachers in the negotiating based upon any event or condition affecting their professional standing and/or terms and conditions of employment including but not limited to any claimed violations. . .of law, rules or regulations. . .[of] this agreement."

The district then filed a petition with a lower state court, contending that the Association could not request arbitration because it had already filed charges with PERB, and the matter in question was not arbitrable because it was not included in the contract. The district requested the court to issue a stay of arbitration.

The trial court refused to grant the stay and the district appealed. The Court held that a party to a valid agreement providing for arbitration was not barred from seeking arbitration by having previously filed charges with PERB, and noted that the courts would enjoin arbitration only if (a) the contract was made under force or duress, (b) there was no bona fide dispute, (c) the arbitrator was requested to order an action prohibited by statute, and (d) contractually required preliminaries to arbitration were not met. The court ruled that under the language of the grievance provision of the contract, matters relating to salary were subject to arbitration, and that in any event, "where there is a broad arbitration clause in a collective bargaining agreement, there is a presumption that all questions arising thereunder are arbitrable" and "it is only where the parties have employed language that clearly rebuts the presumption of arbitrability" that an issue will be held nonarbitrable. (Susquehanna Valley Central School District at Conklin v. Susquehanna Teachers' Association, New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, Third Department, December 5, 1974.)

Arbitrator's Reinstatement Award May Not Be Vacated

The New York State Supreme Court, Appellate Division, Second Department, ruled that state statutes do not prohibit a school board from bargaining on notice of termination or procedures for granting tenure. In addition, the court ruled that the courts cannot vacate an arbitrator's award unless it is shown that the arbitrator either dealt with matters which had not been submitted to him, or gave a "completely irrational construction" of the contract involved in the dispute. Therefore, the court reversed a lower court decision, and ruled in favor of the Harrison Association of Teachers and confirmed an arbitrator's award against the Board of Education, Harrison Central School District.

After the board dismissed a probationary teacher who would otherwise have received tenure, the Association filed a grievance contending that the board had failed to give the teacher proper notice of termination, and that, therefore, under the contract between the board and the Association, the teacher had to be reinstated and granted tenure.

At arbitration, the board contended that the contract did not impose procedural requirements on the board with regard to either notice of termination or the granting of tenure. The board also argued that insofar as the contract was interpreted as imposing such requirements, it was in violation of state statutes which prohibited it from bargaining over either notice of termination or the granting of tenure.

The arbitrator held that the board had improperly terminated the teacher and that she should be reappointed and recompensed for lost earnings.

The board, on appeal, had the award vacated on the grounds that the arbitrator had misinterpreted the contract and the statutes, and had exceeded his powers by enforcing his interpretation of the contract and thereby depriving the board of its statutory authority to grant tenure.

The court held that an arbitrator's award cannot be set aside because of errors in law or fact unless it is shown that the arbitrator "either dealt with matters beyond the scope of what was submitted to him or. . .gave a completely irrational construction to the provisions of a collective bargaining agreement involved in the dispute." In addition, the court held that the board was "not prohibited from bargaining as to notice of termination or tenure by any explicit and definite statutory provision." Finally, the court held that the arbitrator's construction of the contract was not irrational. Therefore, the court confirmed the arbitrator's award on the grounds that the board had not met its burden of proof. (Board of Education, Harrison Central School District v. Harrison Association of Teachers, 2nd NY Ap. Ct. October 21, 1974.)

OREGON

Issues Not Subject to Bargaining Under Old Statute Now Negotiable

The Oregon State Court of Appeals ruled that Oregon's revised Public Employee Bargaining Law allowed unions to demand reopening of negotiation on any issue not previously subject to mandatory collective bargaining and, therefore, not covered by an existing agreement unless that agreement expressly barred reopening on specific matters. The Court thus upheld PERB's ruling, on appeal, in a case involving the Redmond Education Association and the Redmond School District.

After the new bargaining statute became effective, the Association requested the district to reopen negotiations. Many of the items listed for negotiations were not covered by the existing contract because it was negotiated under the prior meet and confer statute which provided for a narrower scope of bargaining than the new law. The district refused to negotiate on any items not directly related to cost of living and expressly subject to the reopener clause of the existing contract.

The Association filed charges with PERB, contending that the district had engaged in unlawful refusal to bargain under the new law. PERB held that under the new law, the district was obligated to bargain on issues not negotiable under the old law, because the contract did not specifically prohibit reopening on matters not previously negotiated.

The district appealed to the court, contending that it could not be obligated to bargain on matters other than salary because the reopener clause in the existing contract was limited to salary, and the new law provided that "nothing in this Act affects a collective bargaining agreement made before the date of this act."

The court held that "in the absence of an express contractual provision to the contrary," subjects not negotiable under the old meet and confer statute became immediately negotiable upon a change in the law which included those subjects in a broader scope of bargaining. The court ruled that the purpose of the section of the statute concerning existing contracts was to avoid disruptions that would be caused by the abrogation of those agreements, and held that this purpose was served where previously agreements "can be enforced as written" while allowing bargaining on issues which were not covered because they were not previously subject to mandatory collective bargaining. (Redmond School District v. Public Employee Relations Board, et. al. Oregon State Court of Appeals, October 14, 1974.)

Union's Communication with Officials Other Than Bargainers Not Unfair Labor Practice

Upholding a Public Employment Relations Board decision, the Oregon Court of Appeals ruled that a teachers union did not violate the public employees bargaining law by attending a school district budget meeting where teachers' salaries were discussed.

The Crowfoot Elementary School District charged that the teachers union was guilty of an unfair labor practice because the bargaining law stipulated that during negotiations no direct or indirect communication may take place with officials other than those designated to represent the employer. The district also argued that PERB erred in determining that the law did not exclude such conduct as that of the teacher union.

The court noted that both the Open Meetings Law and the Local Budget Law stated that all meetings shall be open to the public and that nowhere in the bargaining law was there mention of public employees' exclusion from its coverage.

Reaching the same conclusion as did the PERB, that the legislature did not intend to abridge the right of teachers to attend such meetings, the court held that the teachers union conduct did not constitute an unfair practice. (Crowfoot Elementary School District v. Public Employee Relations Board et al., Oregon Court of Appeals, December 9, 1974.)

PENNSYLVANIA

Only an Employer May Seek a Strike Injunction

The Pennsylvania Court of Common Pleas refused to issue an injunction sought by three ministers to restrain all personnel employed by the Williamsport Area School District from striking.

The Pennsylvania State Education Association and the Williamsport Education Association contended that the court lacked jurisdiction in the matter since the plaintiffs were not the public employer and according to the Public Employees Relations Act only the public employer could sue for a strike injunction against its employees.

The court agreed that the Act limited its jurisdiction in this matter and pointed to Commonwealth of Pennsylvania vs. Ryan, et. al. wherein it was decided, "No emergency, real or feared, and no alleged hardship to a complaining party, however great, can justify a Court's entertaining and passing upon a subject matter which is not within its jurisdictional competence." Further, the court said that the major purpose of the Act, to encourage peaceful resolution of disputes by the parties through collective bargaining, would be undercut if it entertained a complaint filed by a party other than the employer. The court then dismissed the complaint for lack of jurisdiction. (Reverend Alling et al., Plaintiffs v. Williamsport Area School District et al., Defendants, Pennsylvania Court of Common Pleas, November 5, 1974.)

WASHINGTON

24 Hours' Notice Required for Board Meeting on Request for Injunction Against Strike

The State Supreme Court ruled that under the state's Open Public Meetings Act, the Board of Education of the Mead School District was required to provide 24 hours' notice to the press and the public before meeting to consider a resolution calling for injunction against a strike by the Mead Education Association. The court held that the state legislature had intended to provide an "emergency" exemption from the requirements of the Act only where circumstances involved or threatened physical damage, and the likelihood of damage would be substantially increased by a one-day delay. Under this definition, the court ruled that the strike had not constituted an emergency, and thereby sustained the Association's claim that a lower court should not have issued the injunction sought by the board.

After the Association went on strike, the board met in executive session and passed a resolution requesting a lower court to issue an injunction against the strike.

At the court hearing, the judge dismissed the board's petition on the grounds that the board had violated the Open Public Meetings Act by passing its resolution in closed session. However, that evening the board met again in the presence of reporters and a member of the public and re-enacted its resolution calling for an injunction. The following day, the judge accepted the petition and granted a temporary injunction.

The Association appealed to the State Supreme Court, contending that the injunction should not have been granted on the grounds that the board was still in violation of the Open Public Meetings Act when it made its second request since it had failed to provide 24 hours' notice to the media and the public before re-enacting its resolution.

The board contended that it had not violated the Act since the Act specifically exempted from the 24-hour notice requirement special meetings called to deal with an "emergency." The board claimed that the strike had constituted an emergency since it had disrupted the schools and the lives of students and their families, and involved possible damage to the heating system since maintenance and sanitation workers had refused to cross the picket line.

The Court held that the legislature had intended to provide for an "emergency" exemption from the notice requirements of the Act only when the circumstances involved or threatened physical damage, and a one-day delay would "substantially increase the likelihood of such injuries." The Court concluded that the situation created by the Association's strike did not qualify as an emergency under the Act. (Mead School District v. Mead Education Association, Washington State Supreme Court, January 10, 1975.)

IOWA

State's First Final-Offer Award

Final-offer arbitration—the first of its type in the state—was requested by the Keokuk School Board and Keokuk Education Association (KEA) following a dispute over the scheduling of an inservice training day, compensation for Association leave, and salaries. The arbitrator in his award stated that the board's position regarding the inservice training day should prevail, that teachers should not be compensated for Association leave, and that the Association's salary proposal was more equitable than that offered by the board.

In regard to the length of teachers' contractual year and the number of inservice training days, the parties could not agree on the issue at impasse. KEA claimed that it and the school district had agreed that the school year was to consist of 188 days, eight of which were to be set aside for inservice training, and that the scheduling of one of the inservice days was the only disputed issue. Contending that the whole issue was in dispute because the topic had not been negotiated, the board argued that the scheduling of inservice days was a management prerogative, while the number and content of the days were negotiable.

The arbitrator concluded from the contractual language which included inservice training in a list of negotiable items, that all aspects of inservice training were negotiable. He found that KEA failed to sustain its argument that one inservice day should be held on the date to coincide with the state convention, mainly because of the high probability of the convention's being cancelled. He, therefore, gave the award to the school district.

On the issue of Association leave, the school district declared such leave nonarbitrable because it was purportedly in violation of the collective bargaining law, claiming that the leave would give Association personnel opportunity to learn negotiating skills which could be used against the administration to the detriment of "good administration, good school management, and sound educational policy." The school board made a final proposal to pay for a substitute teacher but not to compensate teachers on Association leave. Countering that it did not file an exclusive representation petition because it lacked an address to which to mail it, KEA requested a bank of six days upon which Association members could draw to attend meetings.

The arbitrator dismissed the legal argument on the grounds that the item was negotiable. Finding the KEA final offer poorly drafted, vague, and exacting, the arbitrator accepted the district's offer as more reasonable.

Concerning the final item, salaries, KEA presented exhibits to show that serious discrepancies existed between teacher salaries in Keokuk and those in other Iowa school districts, and pointed out that the district had a budgeted surplus the previous year.

Rejecting the school district's counter claims as miscalculations, the arbitrator found KEA's claims correct and granted the award to the Association. (Matter between the Keokuk Education Association and Keokuk Community School District, Public Employment Relations Board, January 29, 1975).

MICHIGAN

Representation Petition for Inadequate Showing of Interest

Two separate cases concerning representation petitions came before the Michigan Employment Relations Commission.

In the first case, MERC dismissed a representation petition filed by the Michigan Association of Higher Education (MAHE) and a decertification petition filed against MAHE. The Association sought to include unrepresented part-time faculty and academic staff in Gogebic Community College in its current bargaining unit of full-time faculty. The other petition requested a decertification election among the full-time faculty currently represented by MAHE.

While the petition filed by MAHE was supported by dues checkoff authorizations of employees in its current bargaining unit, a showing of interest by 30 percent of the unrepresented employees was not presented. In regard to the petition for a decertification election designed to disaffiliate with MAHE, it was found that the showing of interest petition signature list was not dated.

MERC presented MAHE with two options—that of seeking an election in the over-all unit, or having an election in the unrepresented residual group and adding that group to its current unit if a proper showing of interest could be indicated in either situation.

MERC concluded that the only reasonable means of determining employee sentiment for an election was to require that the petition be dated. Owing to the inadequacy of the showing of interest, the two petitions were dismissed.

In the second case, MERC, upholding a decision of its director, found no merit in a decertification petition involving the Central Michigan University and its faculty association. The director found that the showing of interest documents did not contain affirmative allegations required by the Public Employment Relations Act, but merely requested an election. As such, the documents were not in compliance with the statute. The petitioners argued that the director's decision was in error and should be rescinded.

Setting aside the petitioners' contention that the intention of the signatories was understood, the full Commission, relying on Detroit Board of Education, declared that since the purpose of the petition was to obtain an election and there was no clear designation of an employee organization as the agent of collective bargaining, the petition was invalid for the purpose of establishing a showing of interest.

MERC, therefore, dismissed the decertification petition. (Matter of Gogebic Community College and Michigan Association of Higher Education, Gogebic Community College District, Michigan Employment Relations Commission, October 31, 1974; Matter of Central Michigan University and Central Michigan University Faculty Association, Michigan Employment Relations Commission, November 6, 1974.)

Economic Pressure in Form of Strike Not a Violation of Bargaining Duty

The Michigan Employment Relations Commission reversed the findings of three of its administrative law judges and upheld the decision of one by ruling that economic or unfair labor practice strikes do not constitute violations of unions' bargaining duty imposed by Section 10 of the Public Employment Relations Act (PERA).

The administrative judges in Montrose, Birmingham, and Warren concluded that any violation of Section 2 of PERA which prohibits strikes by public employees "called by a labor organization for the purpose of forcing the employer to accede to the position of the union in contract negotiations is a violation of the union's bargaining duty imposed by Section 10(3)c) of PERA." In Birmingham the judge reasoned that a strike for the purpose of forcing the employer to consent to union demands is analogous to a lockout by the employer, which is a prohibited practice under Section 10. The judge in Warren commented that allowing a labor organization to engage in an illegal strike and allowing that organization to maintain all its statutory rights is "farcical."

The Commission, however, pointed out that although Sections 2 and 6 of PERA prohibit strikes and outline a disciplinary procedure for such actions, it could not assert jurisdiction according to Section 16, unless the violation of Section 2 was found to be an unlawful refusal to bargain in good faith in violation of Section 10. Therefore, because "the exertion of economic pressure away from the bargaining table, whether protected activity or not, does not constitute a violation of bargaining responsibilities and thus does not violate Section 10(3)(c) of PERA," the Commission reversed three rulings and upheld the decision in Lamphere. NEW YORK

A Long-Standing Practice of Paying Annual Salary Increments Cannot be Altered in the Absence of Successor Agreement

According to the state Public Employment Relations Commission, a long-standing practice of paying automatic salary increments to teachers cannot be altered unilaterally during negotiations for a successor agreement even if the practice was never embodied in a prior agreement. PERB, rejecting the contention of the Board of Cooperative Educational Services, Rockland County, held that in the absence of a collective bargaining agreement, the payment of annual increments could not be considered a gift of public monies. PERB also rejected the board's contention that PERB's remedial authority in dealing with employers who violated the Taylor Law was limited to entering an order directing the employer to negotiate in good faith. Therefore, PERB upheld a hearing officer's ruling which sustained charges by the BOCES Staff Council that the board's refusal to pay annual salary increments in the absense of a successor agreement violated its duty to bargain in good faith, and ordered the board to pay increments retroactive to the commencement of the 1974-75 school year plus 3 percent interest.

When negotiations for a successor agreement had not been completed, the board refused to pay step increments to the returning teachers.

The Council filed a complaint with PERB, charging that the board had violated its duty to negotiate in good faith by unilaterally altering terms and conditions of employment during negotiations. The hearing officer held that "a long standing and continual practice of providing annual salary increments is such a term and condition of employment that cannot be altered unilaterally during negotiations." The board was ordered to pay increments retroactive to the commencement of the 1974-75 school year plus 3 percent interest.

The board appealed to PERB to reverse the hearing officer's decision, contending that in the absence of a successor agreement it had no contractual duty to pay the increments, and, therefore, the payment would constitute a gift of public money in violation of the state constitution. The board also contended that under the Taylor Law, PERB and its hearing officers could only enter an order directing the public employer to negotiate in good faith, and, therefore, lacked the authority to order the board to pay either the increments or the interest thereon.

PERB ruled that the payment of increments could not be considered a gift because "the continued service performed by the employees. . . constitutes consideration for the increment," and that "expectation of any annual increment based upon a long standing and continual practice of its having been paid is a term and condition of employment that cannot be altered unilaterally during negotiations," even if the practice was never "embodied in an agreement." PERB also rejected the board's interpretation of the language of the Taylor Law, ruling that the legislature had not intended to limit its remedial powers to entering an order directing a public employer to negotiate in good faith because that would render its proceedings futile, and cited General Municipal Law, Article 3a, as the source of its authority to impose interest payments. Men and Women Varsity Coaches Must Receive Equal Pay

A Providence, Rhode Island, arbitration panel ruled that women high-school varsity coaches were entitled to the same pay as their male counterparts.

The grievance was brought by 13 women varsity coaches who complained that they were not being paid according to the contract. Following the grievance procedures, the superintendent ordered equal pay; however, he retracted when the school's internal auditor recommended that women coaches be paid a percentage of men coaches' pay.

Challenging the accuracy of the auditor's data, the union representing the teachers argued that there was no substantial difference between coaching responsibilities for boys' or girls' sports and that the number of practice hours and games should not be considered. The union further pleaded that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission Guidelines and the Rhode Island Commission for Human Rights forbade discrimination based on sex.

The school administrators argued that the contract provision for coaching pay covered only coaches of boys' sports because when it was adopted, coaches of girls' sports did not exist. The school authorities also claimed that the different rates did not discriminate against coaches on the basis of sex inasmuch as a woman coach supervising high-school boys would receive the higher rate and a man coach managing high-school girls, the lower rate, because of the work load involved. The arbitration committee observed that a man coach who supervised fewer practice hours and games was paid the same as coaches of the same sport whose teams practiced longer and played more games.

In granting the teachers' grievance and awarding back pay, the school committee relied upon general arbitration principles and an arbitrator's statement in Royal McBee Corp. which read that once a binding conclusion had been reached in a grievance, that grievance ceases to exist, and any breach of the settlement terms gives rise to a new grievance. (Providence School Committee and Providence AFT Local 958; December 6, 1974.)

WISCONSIN

Board Cannot Require Teacher-Volunteers To Perform Extra Duty Without Pay

An examiner for the Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission ruled that teachers were not required to work after hours without pay at a camp run by the School Board of Berlin Public Schools, although they had previously staffed the camp on a voluntary basis. Therefore, the examiner held that the board had unilaterally altered terms and conditions of employment in violation of the contract and the Municipal Employment Relations Act when it informed the teachers that their contracts required them to continue to staff the camp without pay. The board was ordered to cease and desist from further violations and to reimburse the teachers at the daily rate specified in the contract for the time they spent working in the camp.

From 1966 until 1972, the board ran a camping program for students after school hours in May which was staffed by teachers who agreed to work without pay. In fall 1972, however, the teachers who had staffed the camping program refused to continue to do so unless they were paid. In May 1973, the board advised these teachers that they were obligated to staff the camp without pay because they had agreed as part of their individual contracts to "continue to supervise assigned areas." The teachers requested and received from the principal a statement that they had been "assigned to teach and supervise" at the camp.

After the board denied their request for extra duty pay, the Berlin Education Association filed a grievance alleging that the board by assigning the teachers to work without pay had unilaterally extended their normal working day and thereby violated the contract between the board and the Association which required the board to negotiate changes in wages, hours, and conditions of employment. After filing this grievance, the teachers went to work in the camp without pay as ordered.

After unsuccessfully exhausting the grievance procedure, the Association filed a complaint with the Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission, alleging that the board had violated the contract and the Municipal Employment Relations Act by unilaterally changing terms and conditions of employment. The board argued that no change had occurred because in their individual contracts the teachers had agreed to continue to supervise assigned areas, and, therefore, their service in May 1973 was voluntary. The board noted that it had confirmed the voluntary character of the camp assignments at a board meeting several days before the camp was conducted.

A WERC Examiner held that the teachers had not voluntarily agreed to work at the camp when they signed their individual contracts because although the camp had previously been staffed on a voluntary basis, it did not constitute an "assigned area" under the terms of those contracts. Furthermore, the examiner held that the board had led the teachers to believe that they "had no choice in the matter," and noted that the board had not informed the teachers of its confirmation of the voluntary character of camp assignments. Therefore, the examiner concluded that the board had unilaterally altered the terms and conditions of employment of the teachers in violation of the contract and the Municipal Employment Relations Act.

The examiner ordered the board to cease and desist from further violations and to pay the teachers at the daily rate specified in the contract for the time they spent working in the camp. (Berlin Education Association v. School Board of Berlin Public Schools, Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission, September 11, 1974.)

Exclusive Use of School Mail Facilities Only for Carrying Out Bargaining Functions

The Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission ordered the Milwaukee Board of Education to cease and desist from allowing a teachers association exclusive use of the bulletin board and mailboxes to disseminate information regarding the internal activities of the organization while denying the same privilege to an opposing organization. The WERC declared that such action by the board was a form of coercion of teachers in its employ and constituted a prohibited practice under the Wisconsin statutes.

The Milwaukee Federation of Teachers complained when the board of education refused to allow it to distribute certain materials through the mailboxes although the Milwaukee Teachers Association was allowed to distribute materials in the same manner on subjects which allegedly did not relate to its function as exclusive bargaining representative.

The Commission ordered the board to cease and desist from interfering with the rights of teachers in its employ and to adopt a policy regulating the distribution of materials which would provide equal use of facilities to all labor organizations except that the exclusive bargaining representative may be granted exclusive use of the facilities for matters pertaining to its function as exclusive bargaining representative. (Milwaukee Teachers Union Local 252, v. Milwaukee Board of School Directors, Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission, November 20, 1974.)

Board Refusal To Bargain over Summer Employment Not a Prohibited Practice

The Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission determined that a school board's refusal to bargain over the hours, wages, and conditions of employment for summer school teachers was not a prohibited practice because provisions in the agreement constituted a waiver of the parties' right and duty to bargain on such matters.

The Nicolet High School Association presented reopener demands to Joint Union High School District to negotiate a contract with it for the ensuing summer school session. The board responded that summer school compensation was non-negotiable as this item was not contained in a reopener clause.

WERC noted that specific articles in the current agreement constituted a waiver of the Association's right and the board's obligation to bargain collectively concerning, among other things, summer school employment. It further observed that nowhere in the agreement was there an exception to such waiver.

The Commission found that the broad "management rights" clause in the agreement clearly precluded the right of the Association to bargain collectively on certain items including summer school employment; that the items for renegotiation in the reopener clause were limited to matters regarding the salary schedule, health insurance contribution, number of contract days, and committee recommendations; and that there was no connection between the items in the reopener clause and summer school compensation.

On the basis of the foregoing, the WERC concluded that the board's refusal to bargain collectively and its unilateral change in the method of computing wages of summer school teachers did not constitute prohibited practices. It therefore dismissed the complaint. (Nicolet Education Association v. Joint Union High School District No. 1 School Board, Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission, October 31, 1974.)

NEGOTIATION NOTES

IDAHO

AGO: State Agencies Not Mandated To Bargain with Employees

The Attorney General of Idaho ruled that state employees have no collective bargaining rights, since the state, its departments, agencies, institutions, and "political subdivisions" are not authorized to enter into collective bargaining agreements with their employees. The chief deputy attorney general noted that in an earlier attorney general's opinion, municipalities were permitted but not required to enter into collective bargaining agreements with their employees if no local ordinance was violated.

The attorney general's opinion was issued in reply to the Chairman of the State Board of Corrections who was dealing with a request from guards for permission to form a bargaining unit. The attorney general was asked if the state board was authorized to enter into a collective bargaining agreement.

The attorney general based his recent reply on a 1967 ruling by the state supreme court interpreting a state statute which stipulated that "when a question arises concerning representation of employees in a collective bargaining unit," the Commissioner of the Idaho State Department of Labor shall "investigate such controversy and certify to the parties, in writing, the name or names of the representatives who have been designated or selected." The majority of the court ruled that the ambiguous language of this statute did not demonstrate legislative intent to inaugurate mandatory collective bargaining in public employment, and that under the statute, the commissioner's duties were confined to the private sector. A concurring opinion stated that an amendment making the statute applicable to public employees would constitute an unlawful delegation of the sovereign powers of government to a private organization.

Accordingly, in clarifying this opinion, the chief deputy attorney general noted that while this statute was the only existing statute applicable to state employees, the legislature had passed statutes requiring municipal public employers to "meet and confer in good faith" with representatives of firemen and teachers, on terms and conditions of employment, and had authorized agreements resulting from these discussions to be reduced to written contracts.

Therefore, the chief deputy attorney general concluded that municipalities, unlike the state, were permitted but not required to engage in collective bargaining with their employees. He added that "once a governmental entity enters into collective bargaining with its employees, it might well be decided by a court that certain employee rights have vested and that the governmental entity would not be allowed at some future date to deny or take away the collective bargaining privilege it had granted."

IOWA

Working Agreement in Violation of Contract Principles Declared Unenforceable

The Iowa Supreme Court, on appeal from a lower court, ruled that the working agreement of Cedar Rapids School District and the Service Employees International, Local No. 55, was unenforceable because it violated basic contract principles.

Alleging that the working agreement was designed to regulate working conditions and compensation, the union filed a petition in a trial court seeking a declaratory judgment to enjoin the district from modifying and formulating new rules not provided for in the agreement. Specifically, the union sought to have the court declare that its members should be compensated for time and a half for certain work performed outside the regular schedule and to declare that the district did not have the right to adjust the work schedule without consulting the union.

Contending that the working agreement was a contract, the union argued that the signature of the parties was not necessary to establish a binding contract and that the defendant was estopped from contending the agreement was not a contract.

The school district countered that it could not become a party to collective bargaining agreements in the industrial context and, therefore, any contract provision of an illegal agreement was unenforceable.

According to the trial court, the parties had not bargained in the industrial sense, and since they did not sign the working agreement, they acknowledged that state law prohibited them from doing so. Basing its opinion on State Board of Regents v. United Packinghouse Food and Allied Workers, Local No. 1258, which held that the Board of Regents "may voluntarily meet and confer with representatives of groups of employees to discuss wages, working conditions and grievances," the trial court stated that the same procedure was followed in the present case in order to establish the district's course concerning this matter. Clarification was also sought in J. J. Case Co. v. National Labor Relations Board which held that collective bargaining agreements in the industrial sense are not contracts of employment but trade agreements entered into between representatives of the employees and the employer resulting in an understanding as to terms and conditions of employment.

While asserting that the board had no power to enter into a collective bargaining agreement in the industrial context, the state supreme court held that it was permissible provided the terms of the contract were within the legal authority of the board and contained no terms which could not be included in individual contracts.

As in Board of Regents v. United Packinghouse Food and Allied Workers, the court was not concerned with whether the agreement would be unenforceable because of a lack of authority by the school board if it otherwise resulted in an enforceable agreement, but rather, whether the parties entered into an enforceable agreement.

In support of its position that the contract was enforceable, the union contended that the validity of the agreement was not dependent upon the parties affixing their signatures to the document. Supporting this position, the court referred to Henderson v. Henderson wherein the Supreme Court ruled that signatures of both parties were not required to establish a binding contract if common assent could be shown.

An examination of the trial court proceedings led to the supreme court's conclusion that the lower court's determination that it could not render a declaratory judgment on the working agreement rested on whether common assent had been given, rather than whether the parties had affixed their signatures. The supreme court disagreed with the union's contention that the trial court was confused in this regard.

The union then directed its attention to possible estoppel relief which could prevent the district from denying the validity of the agreement because of the adoption of the agreement by the school board. However, the union's failure to meet essential elements required by an estoppel prevented the supreme court from reviewing the issue.

In reaching its conclusion that the school-board policy was not a binding and enforceable contract, the supreme court declared that the school district and the union were aware of the board's ultimate authority to reject any requests made by union representatives without the threat of sanctions against them.

Since the union failed to sustain the contention for want of an outward manifestation by the school district that the working agreement was an enforceable contract, the supreme court ruled that the trial court was without jurisdiction to process a declaratory judgment. (Service Employees International, Local 55 v. Cedar Rapids Community School District, Iowa Supreme Court, October 16, 1974.)

Courts Disagree on Constitutionality of Police, Firemen's Binding Arbitration Law

Two New York Courts drew opposite conclusions concerning the constitutionality of the police and firemen's binding arbitration law under the state constitution. The 1974 statute, which amended the Taylor Law, provides for compulsory binding arbitration in the event of an impasse in contract negotiations between municipalities and either uniformed service. The decision is not subject to the approval of any local legislative body or authority, thereby removing the "final step" under the old Taylor Law.

- In an action brought by the city of Amsterdam, the city sought a preliminary injunction against an order of PERB, which referred a negotiations impasse between the city and its police and firemen to binding arbitration. The city contended that the statute was unconstitutional because it required the city to surrender taxing power to an arbitrator, thus jeopardizing a system of government by the people by substituting "government by arbitration."

The police and firemen's union and PERB contended that the city had not demonstrated the unconstitutionality of the statute beyond a reasonable doubt. The union cited City of Dearborn and Firefighters Local 412, [Michigan Court of Appeals] wherein a similar statute was upheld as constitutional on the grounds that (a) the state constitution takes precedence over the home rule powers of cities and empowers the state legislature to "enact laws providing for the resolution of disputes concerning public employees"; (b) an arbitrator's award which increases the price of services is analogous to a price increase of any commodity which places an additional burden on municipal budgets; (c) a monetary award does not necessitate a tax increase because the city is free to reallocate resources; and (d) the award is subject to judicial review.

The court held that the statute was unconstitutional because it compelled local legislatures to either suspend taxing power or transfer it to an arbitration panel not elected in accordance with the one-man one-vote rule. The court reasoned that the arbitration statutes transferred taxing power to public employees who could create an impasse by maintaining demands to which a city could not agree, and under the statute, a city's taxing power must remain with the elected legislature. The court also reasoned that the arbitrator was vested with taxing power in the event of an impasse because to fulfill the requirements of his award, a local legislature could be forced either to increase taxes or to reallocate tax monies. The court, in rejecting the conclusions of the Michigan Court of Appeals, held that an arbitrator's award could not be viewed as any other price increase because it had a "must purchase status" not enjoyed by other commodities.

Firstly, the court concluded that the statute was unconstitutional because it deprived citizens in municipalities of their fundamental right to equality of representation by permitting public employees acting alone to transfer municipal taxing authority from an elected legislature to an arbitration panel which was not similarly elected in accordance with the one-man one-vote rule. Secondly, the court concluded that the statute further violated the state constitution by creating "invidious discrimination" among the citizens of the state on the basis of wealth, because deprivation of voting equality would be more likely to occur in cities with weak tax bases which would be less able to avoid negotiating impasses by meeting the demands of their employees. Thirdly, the court held that, unlike the Constitution of Michigan, the New York constitution did not contain specific language permitting this statute, and the interest of the state in resolving labor disputes was outweighed by the more compelling "national and state interest" in "the preservation of the one-person, one-vote principle." In addition, the court ruled that if the authority exercised by the arbitration panel was not viewed as taxing power, the statute was still in violation of the state constitution, because the latter specifically prohibited the suspension of taxing authority that results from this standpoint. Finally, the court concluded that while under the statute an arbitrator's award was subject to judicial review, that fact alone did not render "taxation without representation" constitutional.

While holding that the state statute was unconstitutional, however, the court ruled that municipalities were free to voluntarily agree to submit to compulsory arbitration through local ordinances. The court granted the injunction.

● The city of Corning petitioned the state supreme court for Steuben County to grant an injunction staying arbitration proceedings which had been ordered by PERB in impasses between the city and the police and the firemen. The city contended that the statute was unconstitutional because it established taxation without representation, violated the home rule provisions of the state constitution, and was discriminatory because it affected only firemen and police. In addition, the city contended that the statute could not be applied to Corning because as a general statute it could not be enforced in violation of the city charter which was a special act of the state legislature, and mandated the placement of legislative authority in the hands of elective officials. Finally, the city argued that the statute should not be applied retroactively to the dispute between Corning and its employees because the negotiations between them could have been completed before the law went into effect except for the willful delaying tactics of those employee groups.

The court held that the statute was constitutional because under Article IX of the state constitution, the authority granted to a local government to adopt and amend local laws relating to the terms and conditions of employment of its employees could not be exercised in a manner inconsistent with any general laws of the state. The court also held that the state legislature by enacting a general law could mandate terms and conditions of employment for municipal employees and thereby mandate expenditures for local governments with respect to specific categories of employees. If the legislature could do this directly, it could also do so through the medium of compulsory arbitration. The court noted that "the courts are to preserve the constitutionality of legislation unless we are restrained by clear, unequivocal and express constitutional provisions."

In addition, the court rejected the city's claim that the statute could not be applied to it because local legislation may not be inconsistent with a general state law, and therefore the city charter must yield insofar as it is inconsistent with state law. Finally, the court rejected the claim that the law could or should not be applied retroactively to the city's pending dispute with its employees because binding arbitration was not a new remedy but only a "more effective means of enforcing established rights and remedies" under the Taylor Law, and the application of binding arbitration would not deprive the city of a substantial right because the city had not exercised its rights under the old Taylor Law by taking the final step of legislative review which had been removed by the new statute.

The court ordered the city to proceed with binding arbitration. (City of Amsterdam v. Helsby et. al., New York State Supreme Court, Montgomery County, November 30, 1974; City of Corning v. Civil Service Employees Assn. et. al., New York State Supreme Court, December 19, 1974.)

OKLAHOMA

"Meet and Confer" Law for Firemen and Police Constitutional

According to the Oklahoma Supreme Court, a state statute granting municipal policemen and firemen the right to "meet and confer" with municipal employers regarding terms and conditions of employment properly superceded contrary municipal charter provisions because it involved a matter of state-wide concern and did not violate the state constitution because it did not require municipal employers to engage in collective bargaining. However, the court, ruling in favor of the City of Midwest City, held that the state legislature in amending the statute violated the state constitution by broadening the coverage to include other municipal employees without re-enacting the statute at length, and by endowing the Public Employment Relations Board with jurisdiction over unfair labor practice cases without defining the board's power in these cases. Therefore, the Court declared that the statute was inoperative insofar as it applied to municipal employees other than firemen and policemen, and upheld the ruling of a lower court which had granted the city a writ which prohibited the Public Employment Relations Board from exercising its jurisdiction in an unfair labor practice case involving the city and the Fraternal Order of Police.

When the city refused to negotiate with the Fraternal Order of Police regarding salary, the FOP filed a petition with the Public Employment Relations Board, charging that the city "had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices." The city requested a district court to enjoin the board from exercising jurisdiction in the case on the grounds that under the city charter, the city was solely responsible for reclassifying police personnel, as was allegedly required by the FOP's salary proposal, and, therefore, the dispute was a matter of municipal concern to which statute could not be applied under the Oklahoma state constitution.

The district court held that the "administration of municipal police and fire departments are matters of municipal concern" on which the city charters supercede general laws under the Oklahoma state constitution and ruled that the statute was null and void because it violated the provisions of the state constitution respecting municipal charters by forcing municipalities to bargain over matters of purely municipal concern. The Public Employment Relations Board was enjoined from taking further steps to enforce the statute in this dispute.

The Board appealed the district court ruling to the Oklahoma Supreme Court, contending that the statute was constitutional since it did not require municipalities to bargain, but solely to meet and confer with employees on terms and conditions of employment, and permitted the municipalities to treat the proposals of employees and arbitrator's findings as advice which the municipalities were free to accept or reject.

The city contended that the 1972 amendment to the statute was unconstitutional and, therefore, the Board had no authority or jurisdiction to hear or adjudicate any matter presented by FOP.

The supreme court, reversing the lower court's decision, held that the statute was constitutional insofar as it did not authorize collective bargaining, but "merely provides for a collective voice for firefighters and policemen to speak to their employer," and "the privilege of communicating with their respective employers with a collective voice involves a matter of state-wide concern" and therefore "supersedes any [municipal] charter provisions to the contrary." However, the court held that the 1972 amendment to the statute was unconstitutional because in the absense of "legislative standards or guidelines prescribing what the Board may do if an individual or entity is charged with unfair labor practices. . .the legislature has, in effect, delegated to the Board, legislative powers which it alone could exercise." In addition, the court ruled that the legislature had violated the state constitution by amending the statute so as to include all municipal employees by reference under the term "Firefighters and Policemen," rather than reenacting and publishing the entire statute as amended. Therefore, the court granted the city a writ prohibiting the Public Employment Relations Board from exercising jurisdiction in the dispute between the city and the FOP, and declared that "the 1971 Act and the 1972 amendment is inoperative" insofar as it affects any employees other than firemen or policemen. State Budget Director Is Public Employer for Purposes of Wage Bargaining with State Employees

The State Supreme Court ruled that to fulfill the legal right of state employees to bargain on wages, bargaining had to occur before salary rates were submitted for final approval to the state legislature, and held that the state budget director had the right to revise the salary recommendations of the State Personnel Board. The latter could not bargain because its recommendations were subject to approval by the budget director. Therefore, in order to fulfill the bargaining rights of state employees, the court ruled that "the appropriate 'public employer' for purposes of wage bargaining is the budget director" because he had the power to approve the Board's recommendations.

Under state law, the State Personnel Board recommends salary rates for state employees which are supposed to be competitive with those of private industry. The Board's recommendations are then subject to the approval of the state budget director, the governor, and finally the state legislature.

After the Board submitted its recommendations on salary, the budget director revised them downward and requested the union representing state employees to negotiate. The union refused to negotiate and filed suit in the state supreme court, contending that under state statute, the budget director was not authorized either to alter the recommendations of the Board or to act as the state's bargaining agent.

The Court held that "if the right to bargain for wages is not to be an empty one, the state's bargainer must be a final stop on the journey to the legislature." The Court ruled that the Board could not bargain for the state because its recommendations were subject to approval and revision by the budget director. Therefore, the Court concluded that "the appropriate 'public employer' for purposes of wage bargaining is the budget director" because he has the power to review the Board's recommendations. (John Ortblad, et. al. v. State of Washington, Washington State Supreme Court, January 10, 1975.)

FEDERAL

Overtime Guidelines for Police and Firemen

In December 1974, the Wage and Hour Administrator issued regulations for implementing the amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act, which extended the coverage of the Act to public employees engaged in fire protection and law enforcement. These regulations deal with overtime pay and minimum wages which became effective January 1, 1975.

Any public employer, including forest conservation agencies and correctional institutions, employing more than five employees who spend 80 percent of their time engaged in fire protection and law enforcement and who are paid on a workweek basis, must pay these employees time and one-half for time worked beyond 40 hours a week.

Covered employees include all those who have legal authority and spend 80 percent of their working time engaged in law enforcement or the prevention, control, and extinguishing of fires, with the exception of those who are working in a bona fide executive, administrative, or professional capacity. Ambulance and rescue service personnel employed by a law enforcement or fire protection agency are also covered if their work is an integral part of the agency's activities. Those who work for other public agencies are also covered if they have not been covered previously by FLSA and they have received special training and are regularly dispatched to fires, riots, etc.

An employer may choose to calculate hours worked over a work period from 9 to 28 days rather than a workweek. An employer using this option is not required to pay overtime unless hours worked exceed 8.57 per day or 60 per week, and may provide compensatory time instead of overtime where state law permits, provided wages paid per hour over the work period are equal to the statutory minimum wage.

However, to gain this work period system, the employer must count as working time and compensate the employee for all time when the employee is on duty including:

- All pre- and post-shift activities which are integral part of work
- Time spent attending required training classes
- Time spent off the employer's premises during which an employee, as a result of work performed or to be performed, is not able to effectively use time for personal pursuits
- Sleep time or meal time if an employee is on duty for 24 hours or less, or where the tour off duty is greater than 24 hours, unless the employee in this case specifically agrees to exclude such time. Such an agreement is not valid if the period covered exceeds 8 hours, or if the employee's sleep is interrupted to the extent that sleep time falls below 5 hours
- Early relief time—where an employer requires employees to relieve their fellow workers on a previous shift prior to their own scheduled starting time
- Trading time—where the employer encourages employees to substitute for others on shifts for reasons of business necessity and the time is not "traded back" within 12 months.

THE CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—APRIL 1975

The Consumer Price Index rose 0.5 percent in April to 158.6 (1967=100), the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the U.S. Department of Labor reported. Prices rose for many items including used cars, furniture, houses, gasoline, magazines, auto insurance, natural gas, and some food items, notably fresh fruits, eggs, and beef. Prices declined, however, for many other food items, particularly fresh vegetables and sugar. Mortgage interest rates were lower.

Seasonally adjusted changes

On a seasonally adjusted basis, the CPI rose 0.6 percent in April, compared with 0.3 percent in March. The rise in the CPI had become progressively smaller since last fall—from 1.2 percent in September, to 0.6 percent in January, 0.5 percent in February, and 0.3 percent in March. The larger rise in April reflected an upturn in food prices following 2 months of decline and a larger increase in nonfood commodities.

The food index increased 0.4 percent in April, after declining 0.6 percent in March and 0.3 percent in February. The April rise in the food index, however, was moderate—compared with increases early this year and in late 1974. The upturn was primarily due to price increases for meats and eggs. Beef prices increased for the first time in 7 months. Prices for many foods continued to decline. Sugar prices, particularly, fell substantially. Prices for cereal and bakery products decreased slightly in April, after rising rapidly for about 2 years. Increases for nonalcoholic beverages and other processed food items were smaller than in recent months.

The index for nonfood commodities increased 0.8 percent in April, compared with 0.5 percent in March. Monthly increases in this index have fluctuated within this range—0.5 and 0.8 percent—since last summer when the index was rising in excess of 1.0 percent per month. In April, gasoline, coal, home maintenance and repair commodities, and furniture prices increased more than in recent months, and house prices continued to rise. Price increases were smaller than in recent months for many items including new cars, recreational goods, drugs and prescriptions, toilet goods, and alcoholic beverages. Apparel prices averaged unchanged, continuing the stability evident since November.

In April 1975, the CPI was 10.2 percent higher than in April 1974. The food index was 7.9 percent higher, while the nonfood commodities index and the services index were both 11.0 percent higher than their April 1974 levels.

Monthly changes in detail (not seasonally adjusted)

The index for food purchased in grocery stores declined 0.2 percent. This was smaller than the usual seasonal decline for April. Prices were lower in April for most types of foods including poultry, fresh vegetables, dairy products, bakery products, fat and oil products, processed fruits and vegetables, and sugar. Sugar prices fell 15.6 percent in April for a decline of over 33 percent so far this year, but they were still more than 80 percent above their April 1974 level. Pork prices also decreased, but much less than they usually do in April. These declines were partially offset by contraseasonal increases in prices of beef and eggs and a large seasonal increase in fresh fruit prices. The index for food away from home—restaurant meals and snacks—rose 0.5 percent, the same as in March.

The index for nonfood commodities increased 0.8 percent; it usually shows no change in April. There were large increases in prices of furniture, gasoline, houses, home maintenance and repair commodities, housekeeping supplies, reading materials, and used cars. New car prices, which usually decline in April, rose slightly. Prices also increased for most other nonfood commodities such as toilet goods, drugs and prescriptions, appliances, television sets, tires, and apparel.

The services index rose 0.6 percent in April. Among major categories of services in the CPI, the index for transportation services rose the most—0.8 percent—primarily because of increases for auto insurance. Parking fees, auto repair charges, and taxicab fares also increased. The index for medical care services rose 0.7 percent in April, with both physicians' fees and hospital service charges rising by this amount. Among household services other than rent—which rose 0.5 percent—large increases in charges for natural gas, water and sewerage rates, and baby sitters were moderated by declines in mortgage interest rates. The rent index rose 0.3 percent. Charges for other services such as drycleaning, laundry, barber shop, and beauty shop services also rose moderately.

NEGOTIATED REDUCTION-IN-FORCE PROVISIONS

Tomás Saucedo

Protecting teaching positions in a time of high unemployment owing to declining enrollment and tight money has become a priority for teacher organizations. A strong reduction-in-force provision can counter the threat of employment loss by mandating consideration of alternatives following determination of the necessity for reductions and establishing procedures to be used when conditions warrant a reduction. As a guide to constructing a reduction-in-force provision, an array of the elements necessary will be presented along with specific examples from contracts in effect during the 1973-74 school year. For this study, 31 provisions were selected for clarity of definitions, unique aspects, or over-all comprehensiveness. Because of the highly subjective judgments and the limited availability of recent contracts, no statistical inferences can be made. Comparisons will be made with published studies of industry contracts[1] and a previous Negotiation Research Digest article[2] to better explain the concepts and procedures.

The teacher's working conditions present hurdles for the development of objective criteria and fair treatment of individuals facing layoff. While seniority is a well understood concept in the private sector, a teacher's length of experience may vary in significance. Factors such as dual certification, major and minor fields of preparation, tenure, and experience in the grade level, building, department, or school district, all may be taken into consideration. Because of school year cycles, teacher layoff commonly results in loss of employment for a year or longer.

INDUSTRIAL LAYOFF PROVISIONS

In a study of 1,845 major private sector agreements covering 7.7 million workers, about 80 percent of the contracts contained detailed layoff provisions. In about one-quarter of the provisions, seniority was the sole factor governing layoff decisions. Seniority was the primary factor in one-half of the provisions and was a secondary, or tie breaking factor, in one-fifth. Plant-wide seniority was most common, followed by unit seniority; both types were usually subject to qualifications for the job. Other common factors were skill and ability, qualifications for the job affected, and physical fitness. In contrast, seniority in teacher contracts usually is operative concurrently with tenure and/or certification and while primary, it cannot be considered an exclusive factor. However, district-wide seniority comparable to plant-wide seniority is the most common.

Advance notice of a layoff, ranging from three days to over 10 days (average, about one week) was required in about one-half of the provisions. Notification of the employee, the union, or both was further required in slightly more than one-quarter of the clauses. Almost an equal number stipulated payment in lieu of notice for wages lost if the employer failed to comply with notice requirements. Specific notice is not as prevalent in teacher contracts.

Unions were rarely allowed to participate in decisions to implement layoffs; however, they had the right to be involved in procedural decisions and in the monitoring of the layoff in about one-quarter of the contracts. Bumping was specified in almost two-thirds of the clauses, with most establishing restrictions such as limiting bumping to the least senior employee rather than any less senior employee. Such restrictions reflect attempts to limit widespread dislocations. Over one-quarter of the provisions specified layoff for other than regular employees first, such as probationary or temporary workers. Since most teacher RIF provisions stipulate procedures to be followed once a reduction is in effect, teacher associations, like labor unions, are encountering strong resistance to bilateral decisions to institute layoffs. There is evidence of efforts to restrict school-board fiats through narrow definitions of allowable circumstances, thus setting the stage for challenge of the RIF decision. Procedural similarities are noted in the discussion on seniority.

Additional protection from layoff or "super-seniority" for certain individuals was found in about 40 percent of the labor clauses. Often mentioned were union officials, key personnel, or trainees; some contracts specifically excluded older and handicapped workers from layoff. Such special consideration appears only rarely in the available teacher contracts.

A recall procedure by seniority was detailed in most private sector contracts, and in about a third, the duration of recall rights depended on length of service. Where stipulated, the employee usually retained recall rights from one to three years. Teacher contract provisions usually use recall by seniority or inverse order of layoff, although frequently additional qualifications have to be met.

Alternatives to layoffs were found in about one-quarter of the agreements, the most common approach being that of "work sharing": either the available work was shared by all employees on a prorated basis or the normal work week was reduced to accomodate the available work, the latter usually to a minimum 32-hour work week. Other alternatives were limits on overtime as less work became available, and limits on subcontracting so as to retain maximum work loads in-plant. These concepts are not evident in teacher contract provisions.

While often not as detailed, teacher contract RIF provisions are similar in basic structure to private sector contracts and are innovative where challenges peculiar to the profession have had to be addressed.

RIF PROVISION GOALS

The purposes of a RIF provision are to prevent the employer from arbitrarily reducing the work force by restrictive language which defines the conditions that would justify a RIF, and to establish an equitable procedure for determining who is to be laid off if a RIF is necessary.

Substantial additions have accrued to the body of case law supporting teachers' due process rights in dismissals. These developments are insufficient, however, to ensure that teachers will have firm basis to grieve RIF disputes in the absence of substantive restrictions on school-board authority to reduce the work force. The strongest position is an absolute ban on reductions for the term of the agreement. Short of such language, the less that is specified in the RIF clause, the more that is left open to management prerogative.

LIMITS ON STAFF REDUCTIONS

Provisions which limit reductions in force fall into two general categories. One provides alternatives or bars any reduction for a specified time. The other lists the circumstances which must exist before a RIF can be initiated. Some provisions incorporate both sets of limits, highly desirable where the degree of limitation can be negotiated.

A few association contracts ban reductions for the duration of the school year and/or guarantee alternative full-time employment:

> The Board shall give no less than thirty (30) days notice to the teacher being laid off. Teachers may not be laid off pursuant to this Reduction in Personnel section during the regular school year.
> [Grand Rapids, Michigan]

> Upon termination because of position or program for any tenure teacher, such teacher shall be assigned to another position within the District for which the individual is qualified. Where no such vacancy exists, said teacher shall be assigned to a full-time substitute position, with no loss of salary or fringe benefits, until such vacancy does occur.
> [Bay Shore, New York]

Typical alternatives to RIF's are reduction by attrition, reassignment, and voluntary leave of absence. Recognition of attrition should be stipulated since turnover may diminish or eliminate rationale for reductions.

> Staffing and Recruitment
> Procedure for staffing adjustments in the event of insufficient revenue:
> a. Attrition by resignation and retirement shall be utilized as the first means of staff reduction.
> b. The District may reassign any staff member to a position for which he is qualified and certificated; however, when the financial crisis which precipitated such reassignment has been alleviated, reassigned educators shall have first option for return to their position.
> [Mount Vernon, Washington]

Provision for individual initiative to reduce the over-all impact of reductions is illustrated by these examples:

> A teacher may be granted a voluntary leave of absence under the provisions of Article 8.000 so as to reduce the number of layoffs.
> [Bay City, Michigan]

> Reduction in Enrollment. When a reduction in the number of teachers is necessary, qualified volunteers shall be first reassigned. Then reassignment shall be made on the basis of years of service in the Milwaukee system with those teachers most recently appointed to the school system being reassigned first, except where departmental, necessary extracurricular, kindergarten, primary, intermediate, or upper grade level needs prevail.
> [Milwaukee, Wisconsin]

Where the potential RIF involves a limited number of teachers, all can be retrained to fill existing vacancies or retained in another operative capacity. Proper planning by administration officials can provide sufficient time for the retraining. Even a degree of "preventive medicine" is possible, as envisioned in the example here:

> The Board and Association recognize that on occasion alterations in program or vagaries in enrollment can endanger an individual tenure teacher's employment. Should such a condition occur, the tenure teacher may enter a program to equip himself for alternative assignment with Board encouragement and support. The tenure teacher will submit a written proposal to the director of instruction. The director of instruction and ELEA president will confer. If they agree that the tenure teacher's continuing employment is imperiled, the Board will pay the cost of tuition, books and normal fees for up to fifteen semester or twenty quarter hours credit specifically chosen to provide an assignment alternative.
> To protect against undue budgetary stress, the Board and Association agree that the total semester-hour commitment for the year will not exceed 30; the total quarter-hour, 40.
> [East Lansing, Michigan]

While strong alternatives as job security measures may not be achieved, the second category of limitations are requisite not only to thwart reductions but also to establish the parameters for association defensive action to determine if a RIF is necessary. Failure to list the kinds of situations where RIF's may be justified leaves interpretations of such situations completely in the school board's domain. Teacher interests may well come last in order of priorities, much as in the example below (intentionally unidentified):

In the event the Board deems it necessary to reduce the teaching staff, it shall make said reductions in accordance with the best interests of the district, as deemed by the Board, with consideration being given to the educational growth of the children, and the qualifications, tenure, and competence of the teachers involved within the area that is being reduced, and notify the teacher(s) involved. Any action taken pursuant to this section shall automatically relieve the Board from any further contractual obligation pursuant to individual employment contracts.

Provisions which list justifiable circumstances for reductions usually cite some or all of the following: substantial reduction in available funds, substantial decline in pupil enrollment, elimination of an educational service, and district consolidation. The degree of reduction in operating funds or in student enrollment becomes the contested issue with this language in effect, setting the stage for recourse to an arbitor or to the courts.

Teacher Lay-Off and Re-Employment

B.16.61 When a reduction in the district's teaching staff is expected for the coming year due to a loss of students in ADA, educational programs, federally-funded programs or curriculum changes, the following procedure will be used.

B-16.611 The Superintendent and Assistant Superintendent shall determine the area, subject or programs that will lose staff positions for the coming year.

The Personnel Office will determine how many staff positions in the area, subject or programs to lose units, are planning to retire, resign or go on leave for the coming year. That number shall reduce the amount of staff members to be laid off the coming year.

B-16.613 A teacher to be laid off, who is certified in another area or subject, shall have the right to a vacant position in such area or subject.

[Hillsborough County (Tampa), Florida]

The narrowness of definition can further limit board discretion as well as strengthen the association's position. For example, enrollment decline is measured and stipulated in increments of 20 students in this excerpt:

Job Security

With respect to the total number of members of the Unit employed on October 13, 1972, and the total enrollments as of that date by levels as noted below; if there should be an enrollment decline of 20 students on any level the following adjustments shall be made.

For primary and intermediate levels a drop of 20 students in total enrollment for either level shall result in excessing one teacher for such level. For each drop of 20 students on the junior or senior high levels, there shall be one less class scheduled in five of the instructional areas. No subject area shall be decreased by more than one class for each drop of 20 students.

[Bay Shore, New York]

In summary, the association's first goal—that of limiting the board's authority to arbitrarily reduce staff—can best be achieved through negotiated alternatives and through agreement on a definition of the justifiable RIF situations written into the contract. With regard to definitions, the burden of proof shifts to the board with increasing specificity. The association's ability to challenge the RIF decision is thereby increased even though a procedure for challenge may not have been in the contract.

ADVANCE NOTICE TO THE TEACHER ORGANIZATION

The first procedural consideration vital to the association's concern for equitable treatment of teachers in RIF situations is that of advance notice to the bargaining representative. Few teacher contracts included strict requirements for advance notice, a provision not uncommon in private sector provisions. The low incidence of a requirement for advance notice is not indicative of lesser priority ascribed to the procedure. NEA negotiation guides, articles, and state models identify advance notice as a key to organizational success in protecting members from loss of employment. Since the clause should force the board to justify the need for a reduction in force, the notice should, at minimum, contain the justification of and the effective date of the reduction. It follows that the board should be obligated to share information and relevant data to test the need for reduction under the reasons given in the notice. The association would then be in the best position for challenge, or if a RIF is unavoidable, negotiation over the number of positions affected, the individuals involved, and the schedule of such events as public announcement of the RIF, individual notices, appeals, and transfers. As in industry, the notice requirement would be strengthened by provision for penalties for failure to comply, such as a wage payment, or bar to implementation for a given length of time.

Ideally, language should require the board to notify the association within a specified time sufficiently in advance to allow discussion of alternatives and to prepare implementation plans acceptable to both sides should conditions actually warrant a reduction and though the decision to RIF may not be negotiable, the impact on the teaching staff is negotiable.

In the example below, a reduction is allowed only under the three conditions listed, and the board is required to notify the association before implementation. Although no time limit on notice is imposed, nor is a penalty evident, the clause illustrates the extent of stricture association negotiators have achieved:

No teacher shall be discharged or laid off pursuant to a necessary reduction in personnel unless there is a decrease in the students enrolled in the school district or a lack of operating funds, or the reduction of or elimination of programs.

Prior to reaching a conclusion to reduce personnel, the Board will give notice to the Association and give the Association an opportunity to meet with the Board regarding:

The necessity and extent of such reduction of personnel.

The criteria to be used in determining the types of programs that will be reduced or eliminated.

[Battle Creek, Michigan]

REVIEW, CONSULTATION, NEGOTIATION

Closely related to required advance notice is requiring an opportunity for review, consultation, or even negotiation over the impact of a decision to RIF and the implementation procedures, well in advance of the actual reduction. Review provides involvement of the association, limited usually to announcement of the board's intentions. Even the bare bones participation implied in such provisions was not common in the contracts studies, and only rarely were consultation or negotiation rights included in RIF clauses. Teacher advocates should, nonetheless, strive for language mandating bilateral decisions on the impact of staff reductions. Issues arising out of review and consultation should be grievable; both grievances and negotiations impasse relating to a RIF provision should be subject to binding arbitration.

Variants excerpted below indicate review rights and access to grievance procedure for issues arising from the RIF list. The first specifies that layoff will be on the basis of seniority and authorizes the association to grieve disputes. The second allows limited board discretion in reductions "out of line of seniority," but provides access to grievance and arbitration in the event of abuses.

> In the event seniority teachers must be laid off, lay off will be on the basis of seniority as established hereinbefore. It is expressly understood that the Association shall have a right to review the lay off list prior to notification of the individuals to be laid off. In the event of a dispute concerning the lay off list, the Association shall have the right to file a written grievance thereon within not more than three (3) work days or three (3) week days during summer vacation after the termination of the meeting requesting review of the list.

> Reduction of Staff
> Should it become necessary to reduce the number of teachers employed by the Board, the order of reduction shall be governed by seniority; that is, teachers with the least service with the district shall be laid off first in accordance with date of hire. The Association recognizes, however, that upon certain occasions it will be necessary to assure proper staffing throughout the school system for the Board to retain, out of line of seniority, the most qualified, capable and efficient teachers by training and experience. When such an occasion should arise, the Association's president will be advised in advance of the number and category of such teachers. The discretion hereby vested in the Board shall not be abused. Complaints that the Board has abused its discretion in this respect may be taken up through the grievance and arbitration procedures provided in this Agreement.

NOTICE TO TEACHERS

The board should be required to notify displaced staff within a specified time; 60 days' advance notice is common. Where association notification is not required, advance notice to individuals affords at least some opportunity to organize a challenge to the RIF decision. Even where prior association notice and involvement are mandated, the individual notice reinforces the goal of orderly reductions and allows time for appeal.

Three interrelated areas should be detailed in the notice to protect due process rights: First, the time schedule for implementation is an initial necessity. Second, the reasons for the reduction should be stipulated. Third, the reasons for the selection of the teachers affected should be given. This basic information can be used to test whether the reduction is avoidable and if not, whether the selections made were based on objective and accurate application of the criteria.

The following are samples of notice and time limit language which fall short of the content coverage advocated.

> Notice of such suspension shall be given to the career educator thus affected on or before April 15 of the applicable school year. In making such dismissals, other personal and professional qualifications being equal, educators shall be dismissed in the inverse order in which they were employed, provided, however, that no career educator is dismissed while a qualifying educator is retained to perform a service which the career educator is qualified and competent to render.

STAFF REDUCTION PROCEDURES

The majority of RIF provisions investigated dealt primarily with procedures to be used in an actual reduction. Seniority or length of service was often a criterion, along with certification, specific qualifications, and teaching experience. Rarely was seniority the sole determinant. Temporary and probationary employees were often to be terminated before any tenured staff. Where the RIF extended to tenured teachers, provision was often made for preferential treatment of them in subsequent transfers, filling vacancies, and substitute teaching positions. Additional protection was sometimes provided for association officers, individuals close to retirement age, and recent hires within racial and ethnic minority groups. In most instances, teachers were to be recalled in reverse order of layoff as positions became available. Teachers exercising recall rights, however, usually had to meet certification and qualification requirements for the position.

The existence of language covering the circumstances above indicates the general lack of protection under state tenure laws. At least 13 state tenure laws allow dismissals if warranted by economic conditions in the school district. Only a few of the state statutes, California, Ohio, and Illinois, for example, describe the procedure to be followed in RIF situations. Where state tenure law addresses RIF problems, associations should include at least some reference to applicable codes, as in the examples to follow.

Additional procedures can then be elaborated to include circumstances not anticipated by existing law.

> Any reductions in personnel resulting from school District reorganization shall be in compliance with Section 24-12 of the Illinois School Code.
> Before the Board makes any reduction in personnel, it shall advise the Association regarding such reductions and, before taking action, seek the Association's views on the matter.
> [For districts of less than 500,000 population, the code mandates that a 60-day advance notice on RIF's be given and that a statement of honorable dismissal be furnished to all affected. Probationary teachers are the first terminated. A dismissed teacher has priority in assignment to the former position if it is reinstated within one calendar year.]

> When by reason of decreased enrollment of pupils, return to duty of regular teachers after leaves of absence, or by reason of suspension of schools or territorial changes affecting the district, a board of education decides that it will be necessary to reduce the number of teachers, it may make a reasonable reduction. In making such reduction, the board shall proceed to suspend contracts in accordance with the recommendation of the superintendent of schools who shall, within each teaching field affected, give preference to teachers on continuing contracts and to teachers who have greater seniority. Teachers, whose continuing contracts are suspended, shall have the right of restoration to continuing service status in the order of seniority of service in the district if and when teaching positions become vacant or are created for which any of such teachers are or become qualified.

SENIORITY

In 1,500 contracts on file at NEA Research, 44 provisions comprehensive enough for study were found in which seniority was the prime determinant for reductions. The major components of such provisions were (a) either a definition of seniority or a definition of continuous service; (b) a statement regarding types and priority of systems where more than a district-wide seniority system existed; (c) the effect of interruptions in service; (d) the procedure for developing the seniority list; (e) methods for resolving equal seniority; and (f) applicability in assignments, transfers, and layoff and recall.

Seniority was usually defined as length of continuous employment from the date of hire. While nontenured teachers rarely had seniority rights, the period of experience before gaining tenure was included in computing length of employment for seniority purposes. The most common seniority system appeared to be that of all tenure teachers on a district-wide basis and usually had priority over school- or building-wide seniority. Seniority was further operative within departments or subject areas (usually in high school) and within grade levels (in elementary school). In 13 of the 44 provisions, seniority governed layoff and recall.

The provisions illustrated the possible methods for structuring the competing interests of individual job protection and program needs within the district when reductions were necessary. Where seniority existed system-wide, the senior teachers had relative employment security although their own positions might be eliminated. The school district decided which positions were to be eliminated and seniority governs which teachers were to be laid off. The senior teacher whose position was eliminated then transferred into the vacancy left by the riffed teacher.

Strict seniority operating system-wide maximizes objectivity but may diminish adequate delivery of services since the profession is not homogeneous and specialized skills are often requisite to specific teaching posts. Program needs are recognized by provisions calling for seniority subsystems where determinations are first made among teachers within schools or buildings, subject areas or departments, or the grade level taught; other qualifications may be specified. The extreme is reached where seniority merely breaks a tie among teachers with "equal" qualifications. Where multiple criteria govern, a riffed senior teacher may displace or "bump" a less senior teacher, but exercise of such rights may result in widespread dislocations. Within extremes, a local decision must be made as to which seniority system or other objective criterion will prevail. No single system is best for all circumstances.

Whichever system is employed, it is critical that its operation be understood and that necessary guidelines be developed. A good example is that of the master seniority list for district-wide use. The list should be developed early in the year so as to afford every teacher an opportunity to know his seniority status and challenge any errors which may have occurred. It is far more practical and less devisive for the seniority list to be well settled in advance of the need for it.

The following will illustrate aspects of seniority outlined. In the excerpt below, for example, tenured teachers have the right to displace nontenured teachers with less service, while riffed or displaced nontenured teachers have priority for vacancies not sought by a tenured teacher. The provision does not address situations involving only tenured teachers, nor are qualifications defined.

> Reduction in Staff
> If any position within the unit is eliminated, a tenured employee in that position shall have the opportunity to fill any other position for which he is qualified, provided:
> He is seeking to fill a position held by a non-tenured employee whose length of service in the district is shorter, and
> His performance has been rated satisfactory
> If the position of a non-tenured teacher is eliminated, and the teacher's performance has been satisfactory, he shall have first priority on any vacant position for which he is qualified, and which is not sought by a tenured teacher.
> [Islip, New York]

Subsystems for the operation of seniority within elementary grades and high-school subject areas are illustrated below, although the provision deals only with procedures once a reduction is under way. Seniority prevails among tenure teachers once qualifications are established. An effort is made to ensure that "qualification" can be gained in either a major or a minor subject thereby extending individual security. Even the teaching experience requirement can be fulfilled by audit or observation. Given a potentially large "protected class," the lack of a clause for settling competing seniority claims may be a critical weakness although it is conceivable that major/minor priority operates in the enumerated order.

The number of positions to be filled in grades K-6 shall be determined by the Board and shall be filled from those tenure teachers then teaching in grades K-6 in accordance with their respective periods of continuous service with the Grandville Schools, the senior qualified teacher will be chosen over those teachers with less continuous service.

The subjects to be taught and the number of teaching positions to be filled in grades 7-12 shall be determined by the Board. Such positions shall be filled from those tenure teachers then teaching in grades 7-12 who are qualified therefor by virtue of having either (1) a major in the particular subject to be taught or (2) a minor in such subject with actual teaching experience in the subject in the Grandville Schools or (3) a minor and actual teaching experience in the subject elsewhere which the Board, after investigation, determines to be satisfactory, all in accordance with their respective periods of continuous service with the Grandville Schools, the senior qualified teacher will be chosen over those with less continuous service.

A tenure teacher who does not have any actual teaching experience in his minor field may fulfill this requirement by auditing and/or observing a comparable classroom experience in his minor field for a period of at least 10 class periods in the secondary schools or 8 hours in the elementary schools, during one school year. Observation days may not be used for this purpose. However, such auditing and/or observation may be done during the teacher's conference or preparation period but must not interfere with his regular classroom duties or responsibilities. Arrangements must be acceptable to the teacher being observed and the Building Principal and all such activities will be under the direction and supervision of both the teacher observed and the Building Principal. Upon completion of such auditing and/or observation, a statement of completion will be prepared by the Building Principal in triplicate (one copy to the teacher involved, one copy to be kept on file by the Building Principal, and one copy to the Personnel Office).

In order to remain up-to-date, a teacher of non-academic subjects such as music, physical education or art must do an additional 2 class periods or clock hours of auditing or observing once each year.

[Grandville, Michigan]

The focus of the following example is on elementary grades. Reductions proceed in order of temporaries, probationaries and tenured teachers, with length of service prevailing within groups. Qualification is established by meeting both certification and teaching experience requirements in subject areas for "lower elementary" and "upper elementary" clusters. Note that reductions are prohibited beyond a 50 percent change in personnel within a subject area.

The following provisions shall apply if there is a necessary reduction in personnel:

The order of reduction shall be:

Temporary employees without individual contracts.

Probationary teachers according to qualifications and certification.

Qualifications and certification are defined as having a teaching certificate in a subject area and having successfully taught in that area within the last six (6) years in the Battle Creek Public Schools. Subject area in the elementary shall be K-3 (lower elementary) and 4-6 (upper elementary). Third and fourth grade teachers can move up or down one grade level. When more than one teacher is qualified and certified for a position, the teacher or teachers with the least number of years of teaching experience in the Battle Creek Public Schools shall be laid off first.

Tenure teachers according to qualifications and certification.

Qualifications and certification are defined as having a teaching certificate in a subject area and having successfully taught in that area within the last six (6) years in the Battle Creek Public Schools. Subject area in the elementary shall be K-3 (lower elementary) and 4-6 (upper elementary). Third and fourth grade teachers can move up or down one grade level. When more than one teacher is qualified and certificated for a position, the teacher or teachers with the least number of years of teaching experience in the Battle Creek Public Schools shall be laid off first. Exception to the above may be made in the subject area if the reduction procedure would cause more than a fifty percent (50%) change in personnel in any subject area.

[Battle Creek, Michigan]

Teachers holding dual or multiple certification have seniority rights in areas taught, under this provision:

If an employee is certified in two or more teacher categories, that teacher will have the right to assert accrued seniority in such category in order to avoid being laid off, provided he has taught in that category and endorsement area.

[Arlington, Virginia]

A key definition of "qualifications" is included in the following example. While length of service apparently rules throughout the district, retention hinges on qualification.

Whenever it becomes necessary to lay off employees due to a shortage of work, or lack of funds, employees shall be laid off in inverse order of their length of service to the extent that teachers retained are qualified for their position; and whenever so laid off, such employees shall possess rights of re-employment for a period not to exceed two years when vacancies exist for which they are qualified.

Qualified shall be defined as certified and having taught in that area.

[Eau Claire, Wisconsin]

The shortcomings of the example above are apparent in contrast to the excerpt below which both details the order of layoff and provides definitions for qualifications, certification, and length of service. Note that leaves of absence and time spent on layoff do not break the continuity of service although such time is not counted in an individual's total service. The latter reinforces the important concept that the layoff is considered temporary and that benefits are being held in abeyance until reinstatement. Layoff is governed by system-wide seniority in the prescribed order.

Reduction of Personnel

In the event it becomes necessary to reduce the number of teachers through layoff of employment, or to reduce the number of teachers in a given subject area, field, or program or eliminate or consolidate position(s), the Board shall follow the procedure listed below:

Teachers not holding a regular Michigan provisional, continuing, or vocational certificate will be laid off first, provided there are fully qualified, fully certificated teachers to replace and perform all of needed duties of the laid off teachers.

If reduction is still necessary, then probationary teachers with the least number of continuous years of teaching in the Grand Rapids Public School System will be laid off first, provided there are fully qualified, fully certificated teachers to replace and perform all of the needed duties of the laid off teachers.

If the reduction is still necessary, then tenure teachers with the least number of years of continuous teaching experience in the Grand Rapids Public School System will be laid off first, provided there are fully qualified, fully certificated teachers to replace and perform all the needed duties of the laid off teachers.

Fully qualified and fully certificated shall be defined as follows:

Teachers who have earned a provisional or continuing teaching certificate in a given subject area.

Teachers who have completed eighteen semester hours of college credit in a given subject area or have taught in the subject area on a regular basis within the last five years preceding the layoff.

Teachers who have earned the minimum credit hours required by the North Central Association.

Length of service is defined as unbroken service in the Grand Rapids Public School System. Leaves of absences, with or without pay, and absences due to layoff are not to be considered a break in service; and time spent on leave or laid off will not count toward continuous service time.

Any layoff pursuant to this Agreement shall automatically terminate the individual's employment contract and all benefits allowed therein including all benefits under this Master Agreement. Upon recall, the individual's employment contract and all benefits allowed therein, including all benefits under this Master Agreement, shall be reinstated in full.

SUPER SENIORITY AND SPECIAL PREFERENCE

Associations should seek additional protection for officers and key representatives through the mechanism of "super seniority" as is the practice in private sector contracts. In effect, teacher leaders would be a protected group, insuring that organizational response to the RIF threat is not weakened by elimination of persons in leadership roles. Within clauses specifying a strict seniority system, language could dictate, for example, that the president be considered as having greater seniority than any other member. The next officers in succession, to the extent they are considered vital to association survival, could likewise be granted "super seniority status."

Professional education considerations can also warrant special preference in RIF situations. The following clause recognizes that the loss of a particular teacher, although next in the seniority line, might affect the district's accreditation. Such teachers are deemed "irreplaceable" and are protected by placement at the top of their seniority group.

Necessary differentiation among employees with the same seniority shall be accomplished by the following criteria:

a) Employees shall be ranked according to their placement on the salary schedule, with the greatest advancement to the least advancement as a ranking for the greatest seniority to the least seniority.

b) Step a) will be eliminated in cases in which a certificated employee cannot be replaced by another District employee with a greater seniority and whose release would be the deciding factor in loss of district accreditation. In such a case, the irreplaceable employee will be ranked at the head of his seniority grouping for seniority differentiation.

[Mount Vernon, Washington]

Some associations have also believed that persons close to retirement or of advanced age should have additional protection to mitigate the threat of employment loss. The preferential treatment is justified because such individuals face practical barriers to re-employment and have probably rendered lengthy service to the district. These teachers could be considered as a separate class or be credited with additional service years as in the excerpts below:

Any tenured teacher who is sixty (60) years of age or older when a layoff occurs shall be given an additional two (2) years of seniority for purposes of this Article.

[Bangor, Michigan]

Any teacher who is laid off and who in the future would reach age sixty-five (65) (compulsory retirement, Article 36) and who would lack two (2) years of service to acquire retirement benefits, may teach two (2) additional years so as to acquire such needed service.

[Bay City, Michigan]

Where districts have implemented affirmative action plans, exceptions to the standard seniority rules offset the problem of accomplishments being wiped out in a reduction. To counter the "last hired, first fired" effect, the first clause below prescribes separate seniority groups for racial categories (not defined) so as to maintain the racial ratio of the previous year. The second example exempts from seniority mandated reduction of first-year probationary ethnic minority teachers, normally the first in order of layoff, until their numbers are in harmony with the ethnic minority enrollment, or until all "ethnic majority" teachers have been laid off.

In the event a reduction of staff is necessary, the order of layoff described in this provision shall apply within the constraints listed below.

A racial ratio the same as 1972-73 shall be maintained. The order of layoff described in this provision shall be applied individually to each group.

[Ann Arbor, Michigan]

When certification and competency are relatively equal, seniority will be disregarded for all first year probationary ethnic minority teachers and such teachers shall be maintained until the number of ethnic minority teachers employed by the Board is no less than the percentage of ethnic minority students enrolled in the district, or until all ethnic majority probationary teachers have been laid off regardless of their probationary year.

If, at anytime, the percentage of ethnic minority teaching personnel reaches the ethnic minority student population percentage norm, further staff reduction shall result in maintaining a racial balance among staff no lower than the existing student ratio.

[Lansing, Michigan]

VACANCIES

Access to existing vacancies should be clearly stipulated, although the need for such language may be minimized by a provision that the reduction be accomplished through attrition. Where strict seniority governs, however, vacancies are created as less senior employees are terminated. For example, if a position is eliminated and the incumbent is protected by virtue of greater seniority, a less senior teacher would then be laid off and the vacancy created would be filled by the senior teacher. Another operational option could be that of "bumping," referred to in the discussion on private sector agreements. The right to displace any less senior employee may introduce an unacceptable element of insecurity because of a chain reaction as each displaced individual asserts his/her rights in succession. A degree of control can be established by limiting bumping to displacement of the least senior employee and having well-defined seniority groups. Where rigidly controlled, bumping systems would differ from seniority generated vacancies only in that the former is incumbent initiated while the latter follows an established order.

The teacher contract provisions studied usually listed only the employment categories within which seniority would prevail, as in previous examples, and no language was found which explicitly defined bumping rights. Mechanisms were found which provided access to vacancies in other areas where the teacher held certification. This right was usually limited to tenured teachers, as in the two following examples:

Reduction in Tenure Positions

A tenured teacher affected by a reduction in the number of positions in his tenure area will not be released from employment in the district while there is another position in another tenure area available for which the teacher is certified.

[Herricks, New York]

In the event that there is a reduction in the number of positions, or an abolishment of a position, within a tenure area, and such reduction or abolishment requires the termination of the services of any teacher within the tenure area, the services of that teacher with the least seniority in the tenure area shall be first terminated unless there is a vacant position in another tenure area for which such teacher is certified. Said position shall be offered to such teacher.

[Sachem, New York]

The access rights illustrated here should not be confused with recall rights to vacancies after employment loss. While recall is no less important, the first order of business should be employment protection. A clause addressing re-employment follows for comparison with the previous examples:

Layoff and Recall

In cases requiring a reduction of the teacher work force due to a decrease of work or operating funds, principal consideration for the order of reduction shall be: first, temporary employees; next, probationary teachers according to qualification, certification, and seniority; next, tenure teachers according to qualification, certification, and seniority. Any teacher on permanent tenure whose services are terminated because of a necessary reduction in personnel shall be appointed to the first vacancy in the school district according to seniority for which he/she is certificated and qualified.

Each teacher shall have the right, upon request, to review the contents of his own personnel file exclusive of materials received prior to the date of his employment by this District. A representative of the Association may at the teacher's request accompany the teacher in this review. Each teacher's personnel file subject to such review shall contain the following minimum items of information:

All teacher evaluation reports
Transcript of academic records
Tenure recommendations

Copies of annual contracts of the teacher shall be available for inspection by the teacher in the office of the Clerk. The teacher may respond to any item placed in such personnel file and said response shall become a part of said file.

The professional growth program requires that all teachers file a plan complying with the board's requirement of completing 6 hours every 4 years; disagreement regarding the evaluation and processing of credits may be appealed to the Appeals committee; teachers attending classes will be paid at the teacher's regular hourly rate; teacher performance will be evaluated in writing; probationary teachers will be evaluated at least twice during the school year and tenure teachers at least once a year; written forms outlining criteria to be utilized will be distributed to the teachers involved before evaluation; should a probationary teacher receive a "shall not recommend reelection" evaluation on his second evaluation, the teacher and/or evaluator may request and have conducted an additional evaluation;

EVALUATION REPORT PROCEDURE

A copy of the written evaluation shall be submitted to the teacher at the time of personal conference or within ten (10) days thereafter; one copy is to be signed and returned to the Administration, the other is to be retained by the teacher. In the event that the teacher feels that his evaluation was incomplete or unjust, he may put his objections in writing and have them attached to the evaluation report, to be placed in his personnel file with a copy to the Area Superintendent. In the event the teacher desires to have further relief from such report he shall utilize the grievance procedures described elsewhere in this Agreement within ten (10) days of such report.

Any teacher who shall have received an evaluation in the school year which he considers substantially negative may, upon request, have his performance evaluated by a tenure teacher assigned by the Association hereinafter called "peer evaluator". This evaluation shall be made using the same criteria as that which resulted in the original negative evaluation. The Administration may likewise, upon request, have such evaluation by a peer evaluator appointed by the Association in any case in which the teacher shall have filed an objection or instituted a grievance procedure with respect to such evaluation. In designating such peer evaluator, the Association shall consult and make arrangements therefor through the Area Superintendent or his designee. The peer evaluator shall arrange the times for his absence from regular duties and the times for personal "in the classroom" observations of the teacher with their respective principals or other applicable administrator. A person serving as such peer evaluator shall be given released time to conduct the evaluation but may be designated in a school year to no more than three teachers and the time devoted with respect to any one evaluation shall not exceed an aggregate of one-half day. All such evaluations shall be in addition to evaluations made by the Administration, shall be in writing, shall be filed within ten (10) days of the original request and shall be furnished the Administration, the Association and the teacher promptly following their completion.

Dismissal without just cause is subject to the grievance process; in case of a reduction in teaching staff the district will consider personnel for release in the inverse order of their length of service in the district but with consideration being given to areas of certification, grade level, special qualifications, experience, programs requirements, minority employment, and increased level of training; the order of re-employment will be based on the above considerations; a current listing of vacancies throughout the district will be made available to those considering transferring; the administration may initiate a transfer in an emergency and the teacher will be notified through consultation at least 1 week before the date of transfer; candidates for administrative or supervisory positions will be screened by a committee established by the superintendent, which includes 2 teachers appointed by the Association.
